WILLIAM PENN.

CHAPTER I.

HE PUTS ON HIS HAT.

WILLIAM PENN was born in London, on Monday morning, October 14, 1644. He was not born with his hat on, but this is the only time he was ever seen in his bare head. The fact that he was born on wash-day was regarded by the augurs as an indication that he would be a man of peace, loving quiet and determined to have it, if it cost him a life-time of contention and dispute.

He came of an old family. The Penns dated their back numbers away into the earlier years of the 16th century. In Penn village, Buckinghamshire, the first William Penn on record, the great-grandfather of our William, died in 1591, and he now lies before the altar of Mintye church, in Wiltshire. Even in those old days, the Penns were mightier than the sword. They were merchants, and brought much wealth from the loud-sounding sea.

The father of the great Quaker, also William Penn,—for this thrifty family was very economical in the matter of names,—was a sailor. His father before him, Giles Penn, was captain of a merchantman, and young William shipped before the mast on his father's vessel. In those good old times the traffic of the sea was about equally divided between the merchants and the pirates; so the honest merchant, who robbed nobody save his customers, carried his purse in one hand and a pistol in the other, as he sailed. The pirate of the time was a most avaricious wretch. Whatever he saw he wanted, and what he wanted he got, unless the owner carried the longest cutlass and the heaviest guns. So the young sailor was well trained in all the ways of trade. He bought in the cheapest and sold in the highest market, and thumped the pirates, until, loving fighting better than trading, he entered the royal navy.

It is evident that this William Penn did not inherit the Quaker principles of his renowned son. Before he was twenty years old he was a captain in the royal navy, not by purchase, but by rapid promotion on his merits. Having now a secured position which would keep him away from home the greater part of the time,—for only officers of the United States navy are compelled to live ashore,—Captain Penn married a Dutch girl, Margaret Jasper, daughter of John Jasper, a merchant of Rotterdam. Margaret was very wealthy, but Captain Penn did not consider this a bar to their union. "No," said the frank, honest-hearted sailor, "I would marry you if you had ten times so much money." His father-in-law was deeply affected by this unselfish declaration, and on the 6th of January, 1643, the young people were married, and took handsome lodgings in London, living near the Tower, which was then the fashionable quarter for naval men. Captain Penn was a good liver; he wore good clothes, drank good claret and better sack, was fond of gay society, and took good care of William Penn. He was ambitious, but his ambition was tempered with caution, and he was led more by interest than principle. "So long as I get the interest regularly," he said, "I will not trouble you for the principle," and this feeble joke affords a key to his motives in life. In the quarrel between the King and the Commons, in 1643, Captain Penn calmly but firmly established himself upon the fence until he could see in which cart the melons were loaded. Those were stirring times. Charles was more than ever absolute, the people more than ever republican; the quarrel was deepening in its intensity and bitterness. One of the first trials of strength, the dispute over the command of the navy, was settled in favor of the Commons by the appointment of Lord Warwick as Lord High Admiral; and when Captain Penn saw the melons loaded into the people's cart, he came down from his high seat on the fence and said that he too was a reformer, and cast his lot with the strongest side. "It is a frosty day," he said, "when I happen to be shut out with a minority." He was placed in command of a twenty-eight-gun ship, the "Fellowship;" slipped anchor and dropped down the river Saturday morning, October 12th, and the Monday morning following he was telephoned from the city:

"Hello, Fellowship!"

"Hello, Central!"

"Boy—'smorning—blue eyes—eight-pounder. Good-bye."

And without another word he rushed ashore and chased the first street-car all the way to his lodgings.

Stormy times for the young Quaker, passing his childhood in Essex, while his father sailed the seas over, sweeping St. George's Channel like a cyclone, threshing the French wherever he found them, winnowing the seafaring royalists like chaff, chasing the dashing Rupert all along the coasts of Portugal, and first carrying the terror of English arms into Italian waters; a captain at nineteen years, rear-admiral at twenty-three, admiral of the Irish Sea at twenty-five, and vice-admiral "to the Streights" at twenty-nine. There was a model fighting father for a peace-loving Quaker son. The arm of the people had torn away the crown of Charles Stuart, and his head came away with it, the Protector succeeded Parliament, and Vice-Admiral Penn was one of the first naval officers to send in his adhesion to the new government. For Cromwell he smote the navy of Holland, and fairly drove his wife's relations off the seas; he added Jamaica to the British dominions, and suffered his first defeat at Hispaniola.

Never at heart devoted to Cromwell, and always loyally and devotedly attached to the interests of Admiral Penn, Admiral Penn demanded compensation of the Protector for the losses his family suffered in Ireland during the civil war, and received all he demanded, "lands of full value of 300 pounds a year, near to a castle or fortification for their better protection, with a good house upon them for his residence." Furthermore, Cromwell made it a special personal request that "this order should be so obeyed as to leave no cause of trouble to the Admiral and his family in the matter; but so that they might enjoy the full benefit of the estate while he was fighting his country's battles in foreign lands."

And having thus got out of Cromwell all he could reasonably expect, and seeing the Penn family well provided for so far as the Protectorate was concerned, the thrifty Admiral, December 25, took his pen in hand and wrote his Christmas present to Charles Stuart, at Cologne, offering to place the whole of the fleet under his command at his disposal, and run it into any port he might designate. "It will be a lively administration," said Admiral Penn, "that can change quicker than I can," and he smiled to think how easily a true statesman can get around civil-service reform.

Cromwell knew of the Admiral's treason almost as soon as Charles, but he said not a word, until the failure of the attack on Hispaniola, when in his wrath he stripped General Venables and Admiral Penn of their commands and dignities, and shut them up in separate dungeons of the Tower, to think about it. Here the Admiral subsisted for some time on liberal rations of humble-pie, an English dish very similar to the American "crow." He ate all that was sent him, and passed his plate for more. He addressed a very humble petition to Cromwell, confessing his faults, at least those of which he supposed Cromwell was already informed, and threw himself on the Protector's mercy. Cromwell at once generously restored him to home and liberty, and the grateful Admiral immediately resumed his treasonable correspondence. He retired to his Irish estates, that with the greater security he might plot for the return of the exiled princes and the overthrow of the man who gave him those estates. He prefaced this step in the usual manner by announcing, as all politicians do when about to concoct some unusual piece of rascality and dishonesty, that he had gone out of politics forever.

Then came the night of September 2d; there was awe and unrest and fear, conflicting hopes and anxious thoughts in the hearts of men. The day went drearily out on London town, and the darkness of a night settled down upon it such as no man's remembrance could parallel. The storm came with the darkness. Through the clouds that tossed, a sea of inky fury in the skies, came no gleam of light, no ray of any star. The wind came on in sullen, sobbing gusts. Then in wailing cadences it swept over the darkened town, wilder and louder as the night wore on, a shrieking gale that rose at midnight to the madness of a hurricane; chimneys toppled and were hurled headlong in the streets, and the roofs were torn crashing from the houses. Ships dragged their anchors, and their hawsers parted at the wharves. In the parks at the Protector's palace the uprooted trees were hurled to the ground. In the horror of the contending elements in all that long night of darkness and storm, Cromwell lay dying, praying for his enemies. With the next morning dawned

the anniversary of the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, and the hand that smote the enemies of the Commonwealth on these fields was stilled and nerveless forever-more.

At this time, and for a year thereafter, the Penns remained on their Irish estates, but the Admiral was busy with his intrigues. But in the Protectorate, mediocrity succeeded genius; one year of the feeble Richard sufficed. With his deposition, Admiral Penn promptly descended the fence on the safe side; declared for Charles; brought the fleet over to the Restoration; personally, on board his own ship, welcomed the King to his navy; and for all this he was promptly knighted by Charles and was made, at different times, Commissioner of the Admiralty and Navy, Governor of the town and fort of Kingsale, Vice-Admiral of Munster, member of the Provincial Council of 1664, and Great Captain Commander under his Royal Highness, James, Duke of York, with the understanding that (he was to be made several more things as soon as the Secretary of State could invent names for them.) And the Admiral, Commissioner, Governor, Vice-Admiral, Councillor, and Great Captain Commander,

Sir William Penn, called his son to his side and said, "William, my gentle boy, there is nothing like seeing the melons loaded on the cart before you climb in."

In the mean time, William Penn, Junior, was at home, taking more interest in the measles than in politics, and getting his lessons and floggings with equal regularity, in accordance with the educational system of that day. He first attended a free grammar school at Chigwell in Essex; at twelve years of age he was sent to a private school in London, on Tower Hill, and at the age of fifteen, about the time of the Restoration, he was sent to Oxford, where he matriculated as gentleman commoner at Christ's Church. He was a hard student, and could row a boat in French, German, Dutch, and Italian, and in later life he learned to sell glass beads in two or three Indian dialects; but as base-ball was not then invented, his hands were not deformed, nor was his nose backed like a camel, but his college advantages were somewhat limited. He was tall and slender, but very athletic and fond of out-door sports; a boy of earnest religious convictions. The only outburst of natural depravity that has been placed on record against his college life is the fact that he wrote a Latin poem for the Duke of Gloucester, with all the jokes in Italics.)

All about this boy—whose mind had from earliest childhood been deeply impressed on the subject of religion; who, at the age of eleven years, "while sitting alone in his chamber, was suddenly surprised with an inward sense of comfort and happiness, akin to a strong religious emotion; the chamber at the same time appearing as if filled with a soft and holy light;" who, in his first year at Oxford, found his greatest delight in reading the doctrinal discussions developed by the Puritan idea—the air was fairly tremulous with religious excitement and doctrinal debate. Puritanism and the profligate, gay, irreligious court of Charles were fighting with other weapons than Roundhead and Cavalier had wielded on Marston Moor. There was a madness in the world on the subject of religion, or rather religions (for every man seemed to have more religions than Colonel Ingersoll has none) and Familists, Anabaptists, Libertines, Puritans, Arians, Brownists, Antinomians, Ranters, Antitrinitarians, Independents, Calvinists, Arminians, Baptists, Perfectists, Presbyterians, Antiscripturists, Enthusiasts, Levellers, Papists, Fifth-Monarchy men, Muggletonians, Sceptics, Seekers, and Socinians wrangled and pelted each other with pamphlets. Atheists swarmed all over the kingdom; one sect arose, holding as one of its tenets that a woman has no soul; St. Paul's Cathedral was used as a stable for horses; hogs were baptized according to the established ritual, by the soldiers, at the consecrated fonts; "one man was found with seven wives," a species of religious observance which was even then considered abominably wicked, and is now only followed and permitted in some portions of South Africa and the United States; prophets, lunatics, preachers, martyrs, fools, knaves, and dupes disturbed and distressed the poor old world with new and old doctrines, predictions, denunciations, dreams, revelations, and visions. Not only the ignorant and vulgar, but the educated and refined had visions, and Lady Springett, Penn's mother-in-law, "twice saw and spoke with the Son of God in her ecstatic dreams."

Just at this time came George Fox, an illiterate shoemaker, plain and unlettered, read only in the pure diction of the English Bible, waging relentless war against all existing creeds, teachers, and doctrines, asking no quarter and giving none, preaching a divine light concealed in every man, a spark of the infallible Godhead, which was the highest guide of human conduct; a light free of all control; every man and woman was supreme; even the Scriptures, Fox said, are to be judged by the Light,—without it they are useless. As he preached, the established church, the government, the rabble, and the members of other denominations sought, by the usual means employed in those days, to modify his teaching, and turn him from the error of his ways. He was beaten and stoned, pilloried, imprisoned, set in the stocks, fined, passed the greater part of his time in jail, but the more he was persecuted the more boldly he preached; men flocked to his belief, and the Children of Light, as they called themselves, or Quakers, as their less respectful neighbors called them, grew in number and multiplied and kept the jails and stocks so full that for some time the martyrs of the other denominations were unable to be accommodated even with standing-room by the authorities.

And now in Oxford, Thomas Loe was preaching the new doctrines taught by George Fox, and Penn and a few fellow-students were attracted by the neglect of forms and ceremonies in the services, (and regularly neglected chapel to hear Thomas Loe.) For this they were promptly brought up and given ten days or ten dollars, for non-conformity, a crime which at that time was considered a trifle less odious than high treason, but infinitely more wicked than murder.

The punishment had the usual effect upon the young men. They now declared they would never attend chapel again; they would not wear the gown themselves, and they would make it warm for any person who did. They publicly declared that any man who would take a book to church to pray out of, would use a pony for his Latin translations. Whenever these independent young men met students wearing the hated rubric, they pursued after them, and encompassed them roundabout, and smote them sore, and tore the vestments from their courtly shoulders, and entreated them roughly; and in all these reformatory movements William Penn was the chief reformer. He was promptly brought up for judgment, and without ceremony the faculty suspended him.

When William returned home, his father did not see him while he was yet a long way off, and run to meet him and fall upon his neck. And when William told him that he had gone through college ahead of his class by several years, the Admiral did not appear very glad. He received the information with a cold silence that must have been very discouraging to his son. He could have forgiven anything but this. The Admiral was fond of recreation and fighting himself, went to the theatre, "loved to dine at a tavern with a set of jovial companions, and was addicted to all the genial weaknesses of a busy man," says Pepys,—whatever the "genial weaknesses of a busy man" may be. But conscience was a complaint that never troubled Sir William very much. (If ever he was vaccinated for a conscience, it didn't take.) He had, in his busy and ambitious life, always managed to get down on that side of the fence where the greater multitude was assembled, and he took his conscience, if he indulged in such a dangerous non-conformist sort of luxury, with him. And to find his eldest and favorite son, the son on whose head he had builded so many bright dreams and plans of gayety and worldly greatness and splendor, cultivating an independent unbiased conscience, a non-conformist at seventeen, with a leaning toward Quakerism,—it was too much. He immediately sent the young man to Paris, accompanied by a select assortment of college friends.

They were not Quaker college friends. Ah, no! They were "howling swells," who wore purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously three times a day and once or twice at night. Penn joined in the recreations of the time. He was presented to Louis Quatorze, he wore a rapier, he fought in the streets one night and disarmed his man, he "sassed" the police, called the waiters by their first names, wore his watch-chain outside of his coat, danced the racket, and was "one of our kind of boys."

In this whirl of fashionable life and the brilliant society of the French court, he temporarily went out of the Quaker business, put up the shutters, discharged the boy, and rented the shop for a sail-loft. But he was not altogether absorbed in Parisian revelry; he was not frivolous. Even while he shared in the recreations of the time, he continued his studies under the learned Moses Amyrault, and with this eminent scholar he read theology and pored over the Fathers. Leaving Paris, he travelled through France and Italy with Lord Robert Spencer, and made the acquaintance and won the friendship of Algernon Sidney, who was then living in exile rather than compromise his political faith.

After an absence of two years, Penn was recalled by Sir William. His father was pleased with him. The young man was tall, graceful, and handsome, with an almost womanly beauty; wore stylish clothes, was an especial favorite with the ladies, parted his hair in the middle, wore it long and curled it; a rapier dangled at his side, and it was believed by the cook that he carried a razor in his boot; and, to crown all, he wrote poetry, French poetry—chansons d'amour, (a kind of poetry so unfit to read that it is kept in duplicate in all public libraries.)

In order the more fully to crush out his Quakerism, the Admiral kept his son employed on the King's business, which brought him in continual contact with the irreligious and profligate court of Charles; he entered the young man as a student at Lincoln's Inn, with the intention of making him a lawyer, thereby destroying the last vestige of anything like a conscience the young man might possess; took him to sea on his own ship, and let him see some sharp fighting between the Dutch and the English; sent him to the King with despatches, and just when he thought he had knocked his son's broad-brim into a cocked hat, the plague broke out in London and tumbled the Admiral's airy castles all about his ears. In the horror of the pestilence that walked in darkness and the destruction that wasted at noon-day,* the mind of the young courtier turned back into its old channels of religious fervor. When people fell dead in the streets and the death-rate ran up to 10,000 cases in a single day, when the dead-cart rumbled through the streets, and the dismal cry "Bring out your dead!" rose like a wail on the night, the young man became more serious than ever. He swore off going to court, bought more religious works, and oft as he heard a dead-cart rumble by, he buried himself in the Fathers and filled himself with tough old rugged theology that it would plague the plague to understand. When Sir William perceived with pain that the Quakerine idea with which Thomas Loe had inoculated his son was taking again worse than ever, he sent him off to Ireland to look after the estates which the worldly-wise old Admiral had secured from Cromwell and the Commonwealth. He thought if he could get his son settled on the Irish estates, the excitement of being Boycotted, evicting tenants, and dodging the land-leaguers would divert his mind from Quakerism.

Alas for the careful Sir William's plans! His son went to Ireland willingly enough, but Ireland at that time was so full of Quakers that their feet stuck out of the dormer windows. Their familiar accents fell upon the young man's ears like words of welcome when he reached Dublin. "Con, avick, dost thee know the gossoon in the ruffled shirt an' the cocked hat? Ah, tundher an' turf, look at the murdherin' plume ov him!"

"Verily, friend Murphy, acushla, sorra the wan ov me knoweth. Will thee make a rush wid me fur the baggage ov him, do ye mind?"

And so once more the dreams of the ambitious Sir William were frustrated. He thought when his son got to Shangarry Castle in the barony of Imokelly, and met with the fox-hunting roisterers of the Killatalicks of Killmanaisy and the Barrynahagles of Ballymachanshara, and learned the taste of peat whiskey, he would forever-more be a man of the world.) The Lord Lieutenant, the Duke of Ormond, maintained a brilliant court. The Ormonds were soldiers, and their talk of war infected Penn. He marched away with young Lord Arran to suppress an insurrection of the soldiers at Carrickfergus. In the siege he so distinguished himself that he won favorable mention in Lord Arran's despatches and praise from all the soldiers, for he inherited his father's fighting qualities. The Viceroy proposed that Penn should join the army, and offered him a company of foot. Penn himself, fired with military ardor, eagerly fell in with the idea, and earnestly besought his father to comply with this proposal.

Here at last was an open road leading straight away from George Fox and Thomas Loe and the much-dreaded Quakerism, and William himself was anxious to walk right down that road to worldly ambition and fame, when the Admiral deliberately put up the bars, resolutely refused his son permission to join the army, and planted his own unyielding will in opposition to the one possible plan of carrying out his long-cherished desires. Surely the Fates intended that William Penn should be a Quaker. He regretfully gave up his dream of a military career, and, proud of his uniform and war record, had his portrait painted, "the only time in his life," says Dixon, "in his military costume. It is a curious fact that the only genuine portrait of the great apostle of peace existing represents him armed and accoutred as a soldier." There were two original copies of this portrait, and one of them is now in the hall of the Pennsylvania Historical Society. The portrait bore the motto, "Pax quæritus bello," and the warlike inscription, "Friend of Liberty, Justice, and Peace."

William took off his armor, laid down his Quaker gun, and resumed the business of looking after the Irish estates, devised by his shrewd father to turn his mind away from the Quakers. In less than a year after his military career was closed, he went to Cork on this business, because nobody ever goes to Cork save on compulsion, heard by accident that Thomas Loe was preaching there, went in one night and heard him deliver a sermon on the text, "There is a faith that overcomes the world, and there is a faith that is overcome by the world," and walked out of that meeting-house a Quaker; in conviction, in principle, in soul and intellect, body, bones, breeches, and hat, a Quaker.

On the 3d of September he was worshipping in Cork, when he was arrested with the rest of the congregation by a body of soldiers, and dragged to the Mayor's court on a charge of "riot and tumultuous assembling." The Mayor recognized him, and knowing him to be a friend of the Viceroy, offered to turn him loose on his own recognizance; but William "would not go back on the crowd," and so went to prison. The Lord President of Munster ordered his immediate discharge, of course, but all Dublin and the rest of the world knew that William Penn soldier, courtier, son of Admiral Sir William Penn, had joined the Quakers.

There was wrath in the house of the Penns when the glad news reached London. William was ordered home, and when he met his father the debate was opened before the speaker had time to put the question. William did not look like a Quaker,—at least, not a broad-brim, thirty-button-coat, long-weskit Quaker. He was a lardy-dah Friend, with lace ruffles, rapier, long plume, and curls; but he was a Quaker all the same, as Sir William soon learned.

After a very stormy session the Admiral made a test question of the hat. His son, in common with all Quakers, had hat on the brain. He ate, walked, lived, moved, and had his being in his hat. The Admiral asked if he would wear his hat in the presence of his own father. William said he would. He would wear his hat to bed, if anybody slept with him, rather than take it off in the presence of mortal man. He might take off all the rest of his clothes, but his hat, never! You had to draw the line somewhere, and he drew it at the hat. Then the Admiral wanted to know what he would do with his hat in the presence of the King? And William, with the calm confidence of a man who has one ace in his hand and three in his sleeve, said he would wear his hat over his right eye, aslant and defiant, turned up in front and slouched down behind, in the presence of all the kings in the deck.

The Admiral, stunned with amazement that any man could set his conscience above good breeding, faced his peace-loving but rebellious son toward the front door and gently but firmly eliminated him.

CHAPTER II.

AND GETS INTO PRISON.

THROWN thus suddenly upon the country, William boarded around for a few months, explaining to his astonished relatives that he had had his resignation handed in to him. The houses of his Quaker friends were open to him, and his mother, eluding Sir William's vigilance, sent him money. It was impossible for the Admiral to continue the siege when the besieged kept up unbroken communication with his base of supplies, and after a few months' banishment the young Quaker was recalled, and came joyously home, put on a clean shirt, and passed his plate for another slice of the fatted veal.

But the Admiral was still nursing his wrath, although it was a large, healthy wrath, that required no nursing to keep it alive. He refused to speak to or even see his son. William stuck to his hat, and, reciprocally, his hat stuck to him. He graciously thee'd and thou'd everybody he met; but Sir William refused to recognize either of them, and obstinately ignored his son, his hat, and his grammar.)

The Quaker was the most perfect democrat the world had ever known. He acknowledged no superior. He was the peer of any man; hence he could not descend to the servility and hypocrisy of what the gentle Friends called "hat worship," he would uncover in the presence of no man. He believed he was as good as any other man.

(There is nothing new or remarkable, however, in that doctrine. Many people who are not Quakers believe it.) That is no test of our democracy. Of course we all believe we are as good as other men. But do we believe that other men are as good as ourselves? Did the Friends of those days believe that? Did George Fox believe the priests who persecuted and the magistrates who imprisoned him were as good as himself? Did William Penn believe Rupert, his father's enemy, as good a man as his father? Did he think the tyrannical recorder who so unjustly fined him as good a man as himself? Certainly, we are as good as other men, and we doff our hats in servility to no man. But are other men as good as we? Of a verity, we believe they are.*

Penn now entered upon his Quaker life with all earnestness and began his life-long wrangle for universal peace and general equality. To show people that he was not a man who stopped at any expense, and that he cared nothing whatever for money, he wrote a book. He wrote the title first: "Truth Exalted, in a short but sure Testimony against all those Religions, Faiths, and Worships that have been formed and followed in the darkness of Apostasy; and for that glorious Light which is now risen and shines forth in the Life and Doctrine of the despised Quakers, as the alone good old Way of Life and Salvation." Having, with some difficulty, found a publisher for the title, it was an easy matter to smuggle the book in after it.

Matters began to look alarmingly peaceful after the publication of this book. Jonathan Clapham rushed into print with an opposition book, "A Guide to the True Religion," in which he held, with the utmost Christian consideration peculiar to his times, that if ever a Quaker got into heaven, it would be by guile and false pretence, and that he never could get in with his hat on, and that no Quaker was capable of salvation, anyhow.

Penn came back at him with "The Guide Mistaken," and there was nothing mild and lukewarm about Penn's books and pamphlets. A Quaker was permitted to fight only with his pen; and when the great apostle of peace spitted an opposition theologian on his gray goose-quill, there was weeping and gnashing of teeth, in which everybody on the opposition benches joined, while the unfortunate man writhing in the agony of his impalement sustained the leading part and could be heard above the full strength of the entire chorus.

During his preaching that year, for Penn preached when he wasn't writing books, two members of Rev. Thomas Vincent's Presbyterian church were converted to the doctrines of George Fox, and joined the Quakers. Brother Vincent was profoundly agitated by this event. He announced a special sermon, and the church in Spitalfields was crowded. He pounded the sawdust out of his pulpit cushion in his savage denunciation of the Quakers, and when in the fierceness of his wrath he smote upon the floor with both feet and shrieked aloud that the doctrines of the Quakers were worthy of damnation, every window in the wigwam rattled. These sermons attracted much attention; for Mr. Vincent, being able to shout in an exceeding loud voice and preach eight hours at a stretch, with no other refreshment than a barrel of water and a dozen handkerchiefs, was accounted a most eloquent man. Consequently Penn and George Whitehead challenged him to a joint discussion, which it was agreed should be held in Vincent's church. These wind-fights on denominational questions were very popular in those days.

But Rev. Mr. Vincent packed the convention, and, long before the hour for the discussion arrived, the church was so crowded with Presbyterians that the Quakers had to be content with curbstone seats, only a few being able to wedge their way into the house. Vincent opened the discussion by asking a great many hard questions that he couldn't answer himself, and Penn and Whitehead answered them so readily, or objected to them with such subtlety, that Vincent lost his temper, and springing to his feet abused the Quakers in a long prayer which lasted till midnight; then he tacked the benediction on his "Amen," announced that he had overthrown and defeated the Quakers at all points, put out the lights, and ordered the people to go home. Indignant at such unfair treatment, Penn loaded his Quaker gun with another pamphlet, "The Sandy Foundation Shaken," and for the manner in which he treated the doctrine of the Trinity in this book he was promptly arrested and committed to the Tower, where he was given eight months for sentiment and reflection.

His enemies tried to wear him out. A forged letter was picked up near the place of his arrest, containing matters which, had they been proved against Penn, would have taken off his hat and all the appurtenances thereunto appertaining. He was confined in a solitary dungeon. No one save his father was allowed to visit him, and he and his father were not on visiting terms. The Bishop of London was resolved that he should recant, or die in prison. But there was enough manhood in the Quaker for a dozen bishops. He declared "he would weary out his enemies by his patience;" that "the prison should be his grave before he would renounce his just opinions;" "the Tower is to me the worst argument in the world." Then he turned to his ink-well for comfort; they could stop his preaching, but he would write, and he added "one more glorious book to the literature of the Tower."

"No Cross, no Crown," like Bunyan's master-piece, grew out of the author's own persecutions. Not only does this work defend the peculiar opinions of the Friends, but it contains many truths that are laid in the common foundation of all Christianity, and passages that are even eagerly accepted by atheists and scoffers, and were applauded by Voltaire. Penn never wrote with the gloves on, and when he had occasion, in the earlier days of his Quaker zeal, to reprove or denounce any man or creed or denomination, he went at it with all the joyous energy of a newspaper showing up the vices of a rival village. In "No Cross, no Crown," he draws a very gloomy picture of this much-abused old planet. "As the world is older," he says, "it is worse. The people of this day seem improvers of the old stock of impiety, and have carried it so much farther than example that, instead of advancing in virtue upon better times, they are scandalously fallen below the life of heathens. Their highmindedness, lasciviousness, uncleanness, drunkenness, swearing, lying, envy, back-biting, cruelty, treachery, covetousness, injustice, and oppression" (here he appears to have run out of breath) "are so common, and committed with such invention and excess, that they have stumbled and embittered infidels and made them scorn that holy religion to which their good example should have won their affections."

Truly, they were a hard lot of Christians in Penn's time, if he told the truth about them. But that isn't all. "This miserable defection from primitive times," he says, "I call the second and worst part of the Jewish tragedy upon our Lord. . . . The false Christian's cruelty lasts longer; they have first, with Judas, professed him, and then for these many ages most basely betrayed, persecuted, and crucified him, by a perpetual apostasy in manners from the holiness and self-denial of his doctrine." Christendom has become "a cage of unclean birds, a den of thieves, a synagogue of Satan, and the receptacle of every unclean spirit." "We find a Christendom now that is superstitious, idolatrous, persecuting, proud, envious, malicious, selfish, drunken, lascivious, unclean, lying, swearing, cursing, covetous, oppressing, defrauding, with all other abominations known in the earth, and that to an excess justly scandalous to the worst of heathen ages, surpassing them more in evil than in time." "I shall conclude this head" (Chapter VII.), says this meek and lowly-minded non-combatant, "with the assertion that it is an undeniable truth, where the clergy has been most in power and authority and has had the greatest influence upon princes and States, there have been most confusions, wrangles, bloodshed, sequestrations, imprisonments, and exiles. . . . The worship of Christendom is visible, ceremonious, and gaudy; the clergy ambitious of worldly preferments under the pretence of spiritual promotions, making the earthly revenue of churchmen much the reason of their function, being almost ever sure to leave a smaller incumbence to solicit and obtain benefices of larger title and income."

This last charge is important, if true. Good people who are worried overmuch about the exceeding wickedness of our own times may find some comfort in looking at the world as William Penn judged it to be in his day.

Still, it is encouraging to see, amid all this madness of universal wickedness and exceeding iniquity, a handful of good Quakers who were the lonesome leaven that was going to leaven the whole lump, if they had to quarrel with every denomination in England to do it.

The second part of this prison book showed the wide range of Penn's reading, and breathes a more hopeful and cheerful spirit. He calls a jury of the wise and illustrious men of all times, Jew and Gentile, bond and free, Greek, Roman, and barbarian, from Solomon down to Paul, Ignatius to Augustine, cardinals, bishops, kings, and princes, Christian and pagan, all testifying "that a life of strict virtue, to do well and suffer ill," is the way to everlasting happiness.

His next work in the Tower was a pamphlet, "Innocency with her Open Face," and shortly after its publication he was released, having worn out persecution with his pamphlets before it could wear out his neck with an axe. His release was unconditional, for Penn was not a man to make concessions, recantations, or promises.

The Penn family was in a sea of trouble at this time. Since Admiral Penn ceased to command the fleet, defeat and disgrace had attended the English arms on the sea, and the King was anxious to replace the conqueror of Van Tromp at the head of the navy. But his wishes and Sir William's ambition were defeated by the malice and enmity of Rupert and Monk. Rupert had never forgiven the sailor who chased him up and down the coast of Portugal, and, in the intrigues which now placed the dashing cavalier in command of the fleet, Sir William narrowly escaped joining his son in the Tower. His health began to fail, and he longed to see his son, the manliness, honor, and beauty of whose character he was beginning to understand and appreciate. Exile from home, imprisonment, injustice, the horrors of the Tower, loss of worldly position, ridicule, persecution, all failed to move him from his convictions, and in spite of himself the Admiral was proud of such a son, and loved him. So when, long after his release from the Tower, and after an eight months' residence in Ireland, William returned home, his father, then living quietly at his country-seat in Essex, met him with open arms and a loving heart.

(However, it was about time for William Penn to get into prison again.) The Conventicle Act, prohibiting dissenters from worshipping God in their own way, was renewed in April, and the Quakers of course went on with their services without paying any attention to Parliament or its enactments. On the 14th of August, they went to their meeting-house in Gracechurch Street, and found it closed, and a company of soldiers guarding the doors. William Penn immediately took off his hat and began to preach, and the constables at once arrested him, together with Captain William Mead. They were committed to prison, treated with indignity, and placed in the dock for trial on September 1.

It was a very important trial. The indictment was read, and it set out the crime of the accused after the usual temperate and laconic manner of indictments. All the world knows that a Quaker meeting is a synonym for an hour of profound quiet and decorous solemnity. And this indictment went on to describe that Quaker meeting, on Gracechurch Street, as a place where William Penn and William Mead and three hundred other people "with force and arms did unlawfully and tumultuously assemble and congregate themselves together, to the disturbance of the peace of the said lord the King;" and that "William Penn did take upon himself to preach and to speak," "by reason whereof a great concourse and tumult of people in the street aforesaid, then and there, a long time did remain and continue, to the great disturbance of the peace of the King, and his law, and to the great terror and disturbance of many of his liege people and subjects." History contains no more thrilling and direful picture of a Quaker meeting than this.

About all the decency and fairness in this trial was confined to the jury-box and the prisoners' dock. Certainly there was none in the court. The prisoners were compelled to plead before they heard the indictment. "Plead first," said the Recorder, "and we will show you then what you are pleading to." An official rudely tore their hats from their heads.

"How dare you," he said, "come into court with your hats on?"

"Put those hats on the prisoners again," shouted the Lord Mayor.

This was done, and then the prisoners were fined forty marks apiece for contempt of court in wearing their hats.

"Shoot the hat," said the Recorder, smiling to think he had made a remark that would pass into history.

When Penn was brought into court after recess, the bailiff again attempted to remove his hat.

"If you take off my hat," said Penn, "you will be sorry for it."

The bailiff sneered, and snatched off the hat, and a cannon-ball weighing thirty-two pounds fell on his feet with dreadful effect.

"I am no slouch," said the Quaker, "if I do have fits, and I don't wear a two-story hat for nothing."

And as the bailiff went to the hospital he remembered what Penn said.

Two or three witnesses only were examined. They testified that they heard Penn preach, but couldn't hear what he said. Throughout the trial the prisoners talked back at the court, to the great discomfort and wrath of the Recorder, who besought the Lord Mayor to stop Penn's mouth. They were finally put in the bale-dock, where they could neither see nor be seen by the bench, jury, or public, and from this seclusion Penn shouted more vigorously than ever, appealed to the jury, contradicted the Recorder, and objected, and took exceptions, until the case was closed and the jury retired.

Eight of the jurors came in, after being out an hour and a half, saying they could not agree. The four obstinate jurymen were then brought into court, roundly abused, and ordered to go out and bring in a verdict. Then they all came in with a verdict of "Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch Street," which the court refused to receive, and the jurors refused to bring in any other. The Recorder ordered them "locked up without meat, drink, fire, or tobacco."

"We will have a verdict," said this sagacious lawyer, "or you shall starve for it."

The prisoners were taken back to Newgate, Penn shouting to the jurors, "You are Englishmen! Mind your privileges! Give not away your rights!"

Next morning, Sunday, the jury was brought in once more, and returned the same old verdict. The court again abused the jury savagely, Edward Bushel coming in for the greatest share. The verdict in the case of Penn was "Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch Street," and in William Mead's case, "Not guilty."

"I will have a positive verdict," said the Recorder, "or you shall starve."

Again the jury was sent out, and a third time came in with the same verdict. The wrath of the court was unbounded. The Recorder longed "for something like the Spanish Inquisition in England." Penn defended his jury, and the Lord Mayor threatened to slit the jurors' noses, and to stake Penn to the ground with fetters, which only elicited ringing defiance from the fearless Quaker. The jury, famishing from a fast of thirty hours, refused to retire again, and were dragged away by force.

Next morning, after another night of imprisonment, a night without food, or fire, or water, weak from fasting, wearied by loss of sleep, feverish from thirst, twelve haggard, suffering jurors,—Thomas Veer, Edward Bushel, John Hammond, Charles Milson, Gregory Walklet, Joen Brightman, William Plumstead, Henry Henley, James Damask, Henry Michel, William Lever, and John Baily—"good men and true," if ever twelve good men and true there were, came into the court-room. The sea of faces turned to them anxiously, and every ear was strained to catch the verdict.

"How say you," said the clerk, "is William Penn guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty," said the foreman, and all the jurors concurred.

The Lord Mayor immediately fined every man on the jury forty marks (about 27 pounds sterling) for contempt of court, and on Penn's demanding to be set at liberty on the verdict of the jury, immediately imposed the same fine on the prisoners. They all refused to pay the fines, and went to prison. At Penn's suggestion, Bushel and his fellow-jurors brought action against the Lord Mayor and Recorder for false imprisonment, and on their trial the Court of Common Pleas gave them a verdict and set the prisoners at liberty in open court.

Before this appeal, however, the fines of the two prisoners had been paid by some unknown friend, for they refused, as a matter of conscience, to pay them, and William Penn hastened from Newgate prison to Wanstead, the country-house in Essex, to the bedside of his dying father.

This son had disappointed all the ambitious plans of the worldly-minded father; all his dreams of worldly advancement and political preferment had been for this boy, who would have none of them. The King had even offered to make Sir William a peer, with the title of Lord Weymouth, but this Quaker son, to whom the honor and title would descend, and for whom it was sought, refused it. But now the dying man turned to his first-born and said,

"Son William, I am weary of the world; I would not live my days over, could I command them with a wish, for the snares of life are greater than the fears of death."

He sent for the King and the Duke of York, and begged them to continue toward his son the royal kindness and protection he feared he might sorely need in those troubled times, and the royal brothers pledged their favor to the son of their Admiral, and James certainly most faithfully remembered his promise to the dying man. And then, with his family well provided for under royal favor and protection, himself crowned with wealth and honors, the titled sailor looked at the times in which he lived, and called it vanity.

"Let nothing in this world," he said to the son whom he had turned out of doors for obeying the dictates of his conscience, "let nothing in this world tempt you to wrong your conscience; so you will keep peace at home, which will be a feast to you in the day of trouble."

In his last hours he talked much with this Quaker son, not only forgiving him, but approving his course.

"Son William, if you and your friends keep to your plain way of preaching, and also keep to your plain way of living, you will make an end of priests to the end of the world." For himself, however, he died a member of the Church of England.

"Bury me near my mother; live all in love; shun all manner of evil. I pray God to bless you all, and he will bless you."

And on the 16th of September, 1670, in the forty-ninth year of his age, he slept with his fathers.

He left all his property, with only a life interest in the estate reserved to Lady Penn, to his Quaker son. The estate, with claims on the state for money loaned and for arrears of salary, was worth about £1,500 a year. And a man with an income of £1,500 could afford to be a Quaker if he wished, although there was no money and lots of trouble in the business at that time.

CHAPTER III.

THE BATTLE OF THE WIND-MILLS.

"LET me write the pamphlets of the people," said Penn, "and I care not who writes their laws." So he sat down and wrote a little one, and called it "The People's Ancient and Just Liberties Asserted in the Trial of William Penn and William Mead at the Sessions held at the Old Bailey in London, on the 1st, 3rd, 4th, and 5th of September, against the Most Arbitrary Procedure of that Court." Somehow or other, the publication of that pamphlet failed to get him into trouble or prison, and the gentle Quaker lived for a few weeks in distressing tranquillity, at the end of which time a Baptist preacher named Ives knocked a chip off his shoulder by preaching a sermon reflecting upon all Quakers in general, and William Penn in particular. No sooner did Penn hear of this than he exclaimed, "I am a man of peace," and putting on his hat sallied forth to find this man Ives and demand a meeting for the usual wind-mill.

Rev. Mr. Ives said he was not a fighting Baptist himself, but he had a brother Jeremy whom he would put up against any Quaker that ever put on a pamphlet. In this encounter, Penn smote Jeremy hip and thigh, talking nearly three hours to his enemy's one. The Baptist, accustomed to run by water, was very deficient in wind.

Lest any incredulous Baptist should have any doubts regarding the result of this encounter, we may say that it is indisputably established, on the best Quaker authority. Penn looked around for somebody else to fight, but the dissenting parsons being afraid of him, he fired a pamphlet at Rome, entitled "A Seasonable Caveat against Popery."

As he had now been out of prison three months, it was about his time to go back, and toward the close of the year, when he stood up, according to his custom, to preach, in a church on Wheeler Street, a sergeant, with a file of soldiers, remarking that such preaching as that was a violation of the laws against cruelty to animals, arrested Penn, dragged him out of church, and took him to the Tower. The last time he had been in Newgate, and it was thought a change of prisons would be beneficial.

This time the Quaker's persecutors determined to take no risks on a jury. He was tried before the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir John Robinson, who was the original Jack Robinson, and inventor of the great American circus. During this examination Penn refused to take the oath of allegiance, which was a trap frequently used by the magistrates against the Quakers, and for this, and for his preaching, he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in Newgate.

"Your father was my friend," said Sir John Robinson, before pronouncing sentence, "and I have a great deal of kindness for you."

"But thou hast an ill way of expressing it," replied Penn, and he was glad that his grandfather also had not been Sir John's friend, else that grateful magistrate had given him two years.

When a corporal with a file of musqueteers was ordered to escort the prisoner to his apartments, "No, no, send thy lacquey," said Penn,

"I know the way to Newgate." Indeed he did. There wasn't a prison of any prominence in London that Penn couldn't find in the dark, with one hand tied behind him.

Being in prison and unable to hold any joint discussions with the benighted preachers of other denominations, the peace-loving Quaker bombarded them from the grated windows of his dungeon-cell with pamphlets. In his peaceful, unruffled way, he called the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford "a poor mushroom," which must have been a pleasant revelation to a dignitary all unaccustomed to hear people speak the truth about him.

Penn was not the man, in his earlier days, to dissemble his thoughts and feelings in print. When his pamphlet was out, no man ever came to the author to inquire into the meaning of any ambiguous sentence or misleading phrase. One of the tracts he published during this imprisonment was entitled "A Brief Reply to a mere Rhapsody of Lyes, Folly, and Slander," and it must have been some comfort to the parties assailed by it that Penn didn't know how to spell "lies" nearly so correctly as they could tell them.

Then he wrote another pamphlet with the brief but conciliatory title, "A Serious Apology for the Principles and Practices of the People called Quakers, against the Malicious Aspersions, Erroneous Doctrines, and Horrid Blasphemies of Thomas Jenner and Timothy Taylor, Two Presbyterian Preachers." This was very soothing to the Presbyterians, insomuch that grave-looking men, with broad blue streaks running up and down their spines, stood furtively behind lonely corners for weeks thereafter, hoping that some happy chance might put them in the way of wearing a Quaker scalp at their belts.

One day when Penn was feeling unusually good and peaceful, having worn his hat for three consecutive days and nights and received a great and renewing sense of virtue and general pacification therefrom, he sat down and wrote "Plain Dealing with a Traducing Anabaptist." He fired away at Thomas Hicks, a Baptist preacher, with two books, "Reason against Railing" and "The Counterfeit Christian Detected."

Religious and theological pamphlets were not mild-mannered mouthings in the good old days.

Besse tells how one of William Penn's opponents "vexed himself to death" over one of the gentle Quaker's savage pamphlets, being the original man who was talked to death. No man laid down a pamphlet in his presence, that Penn did not instantly see his little tract (and go him one better. Or worse, as the case might be, and generally was.)

When his term of imprisonment expired, Penn immediately resumed his labor of preaching, and went over into Holland, which had been captured by the Dutch. He preached the new gospel of peace and good-will through that country and Germany. But he did not make many converts. The idea of wearing the hat all the time was pleasant to the Hollanders, but it did not go far enough. (If Penn had insisted, in addition, that every man of his followers should wear, at all times and seasons, a green knitted scarf of some woollen material, and a red worsted comforter, and a white (originally white) woollen scarf about the neck, and one canvas vest, one flannel vest, one woollen vest, one vest of sail-cloth with horn buttons, one knitted vest, and one vest of tanned leather, and four pairs of pantaloons, all the year round, Holland would have stood up as one man and said, "Here, at last, is a man who can interpret the Fathers.")

Returning from this missionary tour, Penn put on his hat one morning and was married in it to Guli Springett. Penn met this charming girl, several years before his marriage, in the little village of Chalfont St. Giles, in Buckinghamshire. Guided, apparently, by his Quakerly instincts and that peace-loving spirit which breathed such an air of conciliation, and rattled the English language around in hard knots in his theological pamphlets, he married into a fighting family. Gulielma Springett's grandfather was Sir John Proud, a colonel in the service of the Dutch republic, who was killed at the siege of Groll, in Guelderland. Her father, Sir William Springett, was a Parliamentary captain who fought at Edgehill and Newbury. He was an uncompromising, iconoclastic Puritan, and whenever he found a saint in marble or fresco, the saint had to go. "Be they ever so rich," writes Lady Springett, "he destroyed them and reserved not one for its comeliness or costly workmanship." He did right. It is a great pity he didn't find more of them. At the siege of Arundel Castle he was stricken with a fever that cost his life. Gulielma's mother, with wonderful fortitude and heroism, hastened through appalling perils and hardships to her husband's side, and the gallant soldier died in her arms. Only a few weeks after her father's death, Gulielma Springett was born. Thus, from both sides, the Penn family is descended directly from families distinguished for courage, endurance, and fighting qualities, and there could be no better material for making good Quakers.

After Sir William Springett's death, his lonely widow tried the gay world, and "went after recreation," she says, "into many excesses and vanities, as foolish mirth, carding, and dancing." Then she sought the consolations of religion, and tried, it is said, "the whole round of the popular sects of the day." But this is hardly probable or even possible, for Methuselah's self could not have tried them all, had he only lingered a month or two in each one. Finally, after much "weary seeking and not finding," she found the proper prescription for her woes and heart-ache, and married the famous Isaac Pennington. Soon after their marriage they both became Quakers, and William Penn was a welcome visitor at Chalfont.

And here at Chalfont, too, was Thomas Ellwood; and John Milton resided here in 1655. Here was the "pretty box" Ellwood found for him in Chalfont St. Giles when the plague grew hot in the city and the blind poet felt that he needed a change of air and location. Here, too, it was that "Paradise Regained" was suggested. Milton had given to Ellwood the manuscript of "Paradise Lost," asking for his judgment.

"I pleasantly said to him," writes the Quaker, in his Life, "'Thou hast said much here of "Paradise Lost," but what hast thou to say of "Paradise Found."?' He made me no answer, but sate some time in muse; then broke off that discourse, and fell upon another subject. After the sickness was over, and the city well cleansed, he returned thither; and when afterward I went to wait on him there, he showed me his second poem, called 'Paradise Regained,' and in a pleasant tone said to me, 'This is owing to you; for you put it into my head by the question you put to me at Chalfont, which before I had not thought of.'" So the Quakers are responsible for "Paradise Regained."

Indeed, this part of the country was a very hot-bed of Dissent. "General Fleetwood lived at the Vache, in Chalfont, and Russell on the opposite hill; and Mrs. Cromwell, Oliver's wife, and her daughters at Woodrow High House; so the whole country was kept in awe and became exceedingly zealous and fanatical."

The centre of the circle at Chalfont St. Giles was Guli Springett, young, beautiful in form and feature, highly accomplished, and a brilliant musician. She had many suitors; Thomas Ellwood himself was, as the quaint chronicler of the time states it, "clean gone" on Guli; but when William Penn came along, in that snuff-colored coat, long weskit, and phenomenal hat, the rest of the boys had no kind of show. William fell hopelessly in love on sight. They drove out in a buggy with a seat scarce wide enough for one, and every time he went to the house the roomy pockets of that wide-skirted snuff-colored coat were vast magazines of gum-drops and caramels. Oft by the dim religious light of a parlor lamp that turned down, Guli sat and coaxed him to raise a mustache. The Penningtons kept a parrot at that time, and one day in early spring, when the nights were still frosty and sharp, that miserable bird, which had been dozing all the previous evening in the parlor, did nothing the whole day long but wander about the house saying, "Oh, William, your nose is cold as ice! William, your nose is cold as ice!" It was the parrot's last joke. Next morning it was found with its neck wrung, and it was supposed, in view of its strange remarks, to have died of cerebral aberration. Hæc fabula docets that reformers are very much like other people.

Guli Springett became Mrs. William Penn that spring, and until the following autumn Penn remained at his home in Rickmansworth, Hertfordshire, writing no pamphlets, abusing no one, and only preaching occasional sermons. It does not appear that he called any Baptist preacher a liar all this summer, and he ran no unhappy Presbyterian through with a pamphlet.

But this quiet home life, with its simple pleasures and domestic joys, was too slow for a peace-loving Quaker, and soon Penn called for his two-handed pen with the terrible name, put on his trusty ink-well, and sallied forth with a pamphlet that went singing through the startled air like a hat full of hot shot. He began to have trouble with his own people now. Quakerism had not then attained its present state of perfection, and there were some Quakers who Quaked not wisely but too much, Quake they never so Quakely.

Two of these enthusiastic converts set off to Rome to convert the Pope, with many yeas and nays and much hat. The Holy See, with that promptness and firmness which was a prominent characteristic of the Roman Church, turned in and converted the missionaries. John Love was sent to the Inquisition, and by the use of new and improved machinery, that had just been put in the torture-chamber at great expense by the management, was converted into a material that looked like a doubtful compromise between sawdust and sausage-meat, while John Perrot was sent to an asylum for the insane, as the preliminary step to his conversion into a lunatic.

Perrot was afterward set at liberty, and returned to England, where he was more trouble to his brother Quakers than all their enemies.

He advocated the hat doctrine with a broadness that startled all good Friends, claiming that the hat should not be removed even in prayer, except by divine revelation. Penn was alarmed. There was no telling to what lengths this hat business might not go. By and by some earnest brother would claim that it was wicked, impious, and blasphemous for a man to take off his hat when he went to bed; then it would be argued that a man should wear his hat when he died, that he might be buried in it; then it would presently follow that the women should wear hats like the men, same style of hats, just as women of all other denominations wear to-day; then the next step would be to have all hats made not only precisely alike, but of one uniform unvarying size, so that all ages, classes, and conditions of men, women, children, and babies should wear a 7¾ hat, and if the hat didn't fit it was the fault of the head. Evidently, it was time to sit down on the hat, before the hat fell, like a beaver extinguisher, upon the Quakers and their doctrines.

A church meeting was called, the matter was kindly but sensibly discussed, and Perrot was fired out of the society, his license was revoked, and he was forbidden to Quake any more under pain of prosecution for infringement of copyright. Perrot drowned his sorrow and mortification in a flowing pamphlet, called "The Spirit of the Hat," and Penn joyously mauled him with a bigger one, "The Spirit of Alexander the Coppersmith." For some time thereafter he bombarded the expunged Quaker with pamphlets, until Perrot wished he was back in the Roman insane asylum.

Charles issued his "Declaration of Indulgence" this year, and the oppressive penal laws against all non-conformists being suspended, the dissenters had plenty of time to fight one another, and the pale air was streaked with hostile pamphlets, until it wasn't safe for a man to go out of doors without a pamphlet umbrella. Many of these pamphlets were very valuable, bringing as high as 2½ and even 3 cents a pound at the paper-mill. Penn made a desperate effort to write two pamphlets to every other man's one. This was impossible, but Penn came as near to it as any man could. His tongue was not permitted to rust in these stirring times. He had a long and exciting wind-mill with the Baptists, to which six thousand persons listened, and the meeting well-nigh broke up in a tremendous row over the question, "If Christ was the inner Light, where was his manhood?"

It was customary in those days for some one to get hurt with a bench whenever there was a religious discussion, but beyond a great deal of tumultuous talking and irrepressible clamor, and breaking down the doors and tearing up the seats, no harm was done on this occasion. The Quakers came off victorious at all points in this contest,* while the Baptists, as usual, routed their broad-brim opponents, horse, foot, and dragoons.†

Penn also had a public discussion with the celebrated Thomas Baxter, who regarded the Quakers "as so many lost people," and desired to preach to them "that they might once hear what could be said for their recovery." The discussion lasted seven hours, before an audience including noblemen, knights, and clergymen of the established church. Penn whipped; so did Thomas Baxter.

The non-conformists had very little respite from persecution under the Declaration of Indulgence, and they occupied all that time in wrangling with one another. And while they were at it hammer and tongs, the disgraceful Test Act was passed, and petty magistrates and tyrants began to make it so warm for them they had no time to denounce one another as worse than heathen, or to break the doors and benches of the meeting-houses.

Penn continued to write pamphlets, but they were milder in tone, and could be laid on an oak plank without blistering it. This moderation is largely due to the gentle influence of the loving Guli, and many of Penn's old adversaries wished he had married ten years earlier. At this time he writes to Justice Fleming, a magistrate who was filling all the prisons in his jurisdiction with Quakers, "I know no religion which destroys courtesy, civility, and kindness." Penn was beginning to imbibe the true Quaker spirit, and it was even a comparatively safe thing now to shake a pamphlet at him, if the man was a good swift runner and the fence wasn't too far away.

Penn had been five years away from court.

He visited Whitehall at this time, with his old friend and fellow-sufferer, Captain William Mead, to plead for the liberation of George Fox, who was passing the greater portion of his life in prison. Penn was warmly welcomed by James, who carried his business to the King, and secured the release of Fox. James mildly rebuked his ward for staying away so long, and told him whenever he wanted anything to come around. "Don't knock," he said, "come right in like one of the family. You'll find the hat-rack in the hall."

CHAPTER IV.

WILLIAM BUYS A FARM.

AMERICA was the refuge of the non-conformists. Six weeks of sea-sickness was preferable to six months' imprisonment or five minutes' beheading. The wild Indians were kinder and less to be dreaded than the English magistrates and the preachers of the established church. Penn had heard a great deal about America, especially while he was in Holland, and colonies of Quakers had already gone out to the land of the free, settling in Jamaica, along the Delaware, and in New England. He was first interested in the affairs of that portion of New Jersey which then included the region lying between the Hudson and the Delaware. It belonged to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, having been given to them by a man who didn't own a foot of it. As it cost him nothing, it occurred to Lord Berkeley that he could make a good thing by selling his half to the Quakers, and as the Quakers weren't getting something for nothing in those days, they were glad enough to buy anything when they could get it cheap.

So John Fenwick, agent and trustee of Edward Byllynge, bought half of the state of New Jersey, including all the dips, spurs, leads, angles, and sinuosities thereunto appertaining, with all apple-jack privileges and mosquito ranges, for five thousand dollars. This was more than it was worth, but the purchasers contemplated getting even on the Indians. Fenwick and Byllynge quarrelled over the bargain. Friend Fenwick brought in a bill for commissions which just about absorbed all the profits and most of the land. Friend Byllynge said he would take the commissions himself, and let his agent have the land. But Friend Fenwick said he was a poor real-estate agent who couldn't get out of a land-deal more money than the seller and more land than the buyer. The matter was finally referred to William Penn, and this wise arbitrator managed to reconcile the two warring Quakers. Friend Fenwick at first demurred to the arbitration, which gave Friend Byllynge quite or even more than half the land he had bought and paid for, and the Real Estate Agents'

Mutual Benevolent and Protective Association supported the agent, and said such an unusual and greedy allowance to a grasping purchaser was unjust and unbusinesslike, and could not be accepted as a precedent. Fenwick and a number of Quaker colonists sailed for New Jersey, and Byllynge remained in England, overwhelmed by debts, and was compelled at last to make an assignment; his right and title in New Jersey was made over to three trustees—Gawen Lowrie of London, Nicholas Lucas of Hertford, and William Penn.

Penn at once made arrangements with Sir George Carteret for a division of the province, and on July 1, 1676, East New Jersey, or all the province northeast of a line from Little Egg harbor to a point on the most northern branch of the Delaware river, latitude 41° 40′, passed to Carteret, and West New Jersey to the trustees of Byllynge—the first great purchase made by the Quakers in America.

Penn was now at liberty to put into practice his dreams of a model state, his ideas of a free government. He prepared a constitution for the new territory, by which he secured the rights of free worship; every man of mature age and free from crime was declared an elector, but woman suffrage was not even hinted at; a secret ballot was provided for, thus avoiding bulldozing by factory superintendents, section foremen, and ward bosses; juries were made interpreters of the law and had the sole right to pronounce verdicts, and although it was and is a very simple word to pronounce, yet the juries, from Penn's time to our own day, have pronounced some that were fearful and wonderful; no man could be imprisoned for debt, although a collector was permitted to chase a man all over town and follow him to dinner with a bill, and dun him in a crowd, twenty times a day, which was far more distracting and annoying than a quiet imprisonment. West Jersey was divided into one hundred parts. Fenwick immediately took ten parts for his commission, and became the pioneer American land-grabber; Byllynge's Yorkshire creditors took ten more in settlement of their claims, and the colony went into business with what was left. The members of the legislature were paid one shilling a day during the session of the Assembly. "They come high," said Penn, "but we must have 'em."

The province was a success from the start.

The doors weren't open ten minutes before the house was crowded, standing-room all gone, and the last man who got in had to leave his cane outside. Several hundred persons went over this year. In March, 230 Friends sailed in the Kent, and King Charles visited the ship and blessed the colonists before they sailed. It did not sink the ship.*

The good ship Kent reached New York in August, and found Fenwick in prison, of course. A prison without a Quaker in it in those days would have been the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out. Fenwick had denied Governor Andros's right to collect customs duties and other taxes, and Governor Andros had cast the peaceful Fenwick into prison, to prove the legality of his acts. The new-comers acted like prudent Quakers. They kept out of quarrels with Sir Edmund Andros, and let him and the colony of East Jersey wrangle and discuss politics while they attended to their knitting; so West Jersey prospered as East Jersey quarrelled and got into trouble and debt, until in a few years (1682) the Friends saw their opportunity, and ten West Jersey proprietors, William Penn being one of them, bought East Jersey. The Friends made themselves solid with the Indians at the start, and the Indians were pretty friendly, for Indians.

The affairs of the Friends in America at this time were lovely, and the goose warbled at an unusual altitude, and, taking advantage of the general peaceful aspect of all things Quakerly, Penn, leaving his family in their new home at Worminghurst, sailed for Holland with George Fox and Robert Barclay, and held large meetings at most of the towns along their route. This missionary tour was eminently successful. Penn wrote to England that "the Gospel was preached, the dead were raised, and the living were comforted."

The Quakers were warmly welcomed at Herwerden by the Electress Elizabeth, daughter of Frederick, Prince Palatine of the Rhine. She was a sister of Prince Rupert, Admiral Penn's old enemy and rival. Between Rupert's sister and William Penn a warm friendship existed to the day of her death. At Kirchheim, Penn's preaching and his description of the new-world refuge for the persecuted both fell on listening ears and eager hearts; and the first colonists in America who declared it unlawful for Christians to buy and hold negro slaves were the Quaker emigrants who came to Pennsylvania from Kirchheim.

Having been informed by the Princess Elizabeth that the young and beautiful Countess von Falckenstein und Bruch, living near Mulheim, was "serious," the missionaries went to that town. They were warned that the Graf was far more serious than his beautiful daughter, and that he would make it very serious for any missionary he caught hanging around. The merry Graf, indeed, had a weakness for setting his dogs, of which he kept a large and unruly assortment, on unsuspecting strangers, and ofttimes he had his soldiers beat the wayfarer who strayed into the castle grounds. These things made the missionaries seriously incline to hover around the orchard, rather than go up to the front door, sending word to the Countess, in the mean time, that they were (as near to her bower as their exaggerated respect for a strange dog and an irritable father would permit.) In about an hour back came their messenger with word from the Countess that she would be glad to see them, but not at the house, as Pa was always nosing around. She thought it would be best to cross the river and meet at the house of her friend, the clergyman.

But while the missionaries talked with the messenger, the Graf himself, with his attendants, rode forth from the castle, and began to ask them questions. He was not pleased with the strangers. He was indignant because they refused to take off their hats, and when they said they wore them in the presence of their own king, the Graf intimated that that was all well enough in England, and was about the treatment a king of England deserved, but they did those things better in Mulheim. He then called a file of soldiers, who marched the missionaries out into a thick forest, got them lost in the dark, and then, presenting them with the freedom of the woods, turned them loose and left them. They got back to Duysburgh about ten o'clock, but the sentinels would not let them in, and there were no houses outside the walls. So they wrapped the drapery of the sidewalk about them, and lay down to pleasant nightmares.

During the journey to Wesel on this missionary tour, Penn was greatly annoyed because some persons in the wagon in which they travelled indulged in vain and "profane" conversation during the day, and then sang Luther's hymns at evening. He wanted them to give up either family prayers or swearing, he didn't seem to care very much which. However, it may be the hymn-singing reprobates were not so shockingly wicked after all. "Profane" conversation as defined by Penn was not what is called profane* to-day. It is difficult, indeed, to understand just what the gentle William did mean by "profane" language. Idle talk about the crops, predictions as to the weather, politics, conundrums, and all manner of jokes were probably classed as profane and vain babbling by this good man, who denounced the sermons of Presbyterian preachers as "horrid blasphemies." William Penn was a good man, but occasionally he would rake with the teeth up.

Returning to England, Penn went into politics for a season. Algernon Sidney, his bosom friend, and the republican from whose life and teachings Penn had imbibed many political ideas, was a candidate for Parliament, standing for the constituency of Guilford. Penn went into the campaign with a hat full of pamphlets; there was nothing like pamphlets for Penn. One of these had the tone of a modern campaign document. It began, "All is at stake!" —which meant that there was a chance that Sidney might not be elected. Then he went into the canvass in live earnest. He stumped the district for his friend. He "viewed with alarm" to-night, and he "pointed with pride" the next night. He denounced the machine, and he deprecated "bossism," and said the watchword was "reform." Cæsarism loomed like a black and awful cloud, no bigger than a man's ear, upon the horizon. Sidney was the friend of the poor man, and the champion of the people against monopolies; he was for cheap money and plenty of it. He was in favor of a revenue for tariff only. Down with the third term! Penn's eloquence prevailed, and Sidney received a majority of the suffrages, but the Court knew something worth two of that, and the commonwealth candidate was promptly counted out.

Once more Algernon Sidney went in; this time he stood for the town of Kent, and the Court put up his brother Henry against him. Again Algernon was elected, and a second time the royalists counted him out. Disgusted with politics and England, Penn turned his face and his thoughts toward America.

The Government owed him, in claims inherited from his father, about £16,000—"equal to more than three times that amount of present money." Indignant at the treacherous manner in which his friend had been treated, Penn felt like foreclosing his little mortgage and forcing the Government into the hands of a receiver. But he decided instead to take out his judgment in unoccupied Crown lands in America. That suited everybody. It was the only way the King could or would ever pay his debt; it was the only way Penn could ever get a dollar of his account. So in consideration of all the claims he held against the Government, and in further consideration of two beaver-skins annually, and one fifth part of all the gold and silver* that might be mined in the new pro-

* It would have been money in Charles' pocket had he stipulated for petroleum instead of gold. But his most gracious vince, the King granted Penn a territory of 40,000 square miles, and the charter, drawn up by Chief Justice Worth, was signed March 4, 1681, in order to have it go into effect on Inauguration-day. The Merry Monarch, when he made Penn a deed of the territory and paid the notary, said:

"Here, I am doing well granting all this wild land to such a fighting man as you. But you must promise entire toleration to all members of the Church of England, and never take to scalping."

And Penn assured the King that he most assuredly would, and indeed and double he wouldn't. It was all right as to toleration. Members of the Church of England were tolerated,* barely, but the scalping proviso didn't hold quite a hundred years, for in 1764 a grandson of William Penn offered a bounty of $134 for every adult male Indian's scalp, and $50 for every female Indian's scalp.† But this grandson was majesty didn't know a "spouter" from a "duster," and knew not the sudden ways of a "wild-cat."

* Which must have flattered the Episcopalians immensely.

† The woman's rights party fought fiercely against this unfair discrimination in the price of scalps, claiming that a squaw's scalp had the longest and finest hair, and should be rated as high as a man's.

not a Quaker. And there had arisen a tribe of Indians, also, which knew not Penn, and didn't stop to ask a pale-face, when they "got the drop on him," whether he was a Pennsylvanian or pitched his tepee in the wilds of New Jersey.

When Penn appeared to receive his charter, he came into the royal presence in his usual easy manner with his hat on and his hands in his pockets. Charles at once removed his own hat.

"Keep on your hat, young man," said Penn, "keep on your hat, and people won't know you're bald."

"It is the custom of this place," the King replied, "for only one person to remain covered at a time."

"Queer custom," said Penn, "but I don't lay my hat around loose in a strange house unless I get a check for it. I've travelled, I have."

Penn had decided to call his province New Wales, but the King, who seems to have had some sense in the matter of names, and did not wish the new continent to be sprinkled over with a junk-shop assortment of second-hand names that had already been in use for centuries, christened it Pennsylvania—for which, if it isn't too late, God save the King! Penn objected to the prefix of his own name, and suggested plain, unadorned Sylvania, but the monarch insisted on the Penn, against which the Quaker's modesty still protested. (A reporter who was present suggested that, in compliment to the profession, he might spell it Pencilvania,) but William conveniently failed to hear him, and the wretched scrivener was cast into the deepest dungeon beneath the castle moat.

A duplicate copy of the original charter, written on rolls of strong parchment, in Old English text, every line underscored with red ink, the borders gorgeously emblazoned with heraldic devices, and a portrait of his most gracious (and distressingly ugly majesty) at the top of the first page, (now two hundred years old—the charter, not his majesty—) is still preserved in the office of the Secretary of State, at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

Penn and Algernon Sidney drew up the constitution. ("Give a province a good strong constitution," said Penn, "and it will never cost you a dollar for a liver-pad.") The constitution recognized liberty of conscience, and right of suffrage for "every inhabitant, artificer, or other resident that pays scot and lot to the government." Compulsory attendance at church was not enforced; if a man wanted to stay home and sleep all the morning or mend his trout-rod in the back yard, all right. Lying was punished as a crime, so that very few lawyers went to Pennsylvania in Penn's time. Going to the theatre and getting drunk were placed in the same category; as also were card-playing, bull-baiting, and cock-fighting. Trial by jury was established, an Indian to be allowed six Indians on a jury in all cases where his interests were involved. As the Indians never read the newspapers, they made the best of jurymen, and have served the courts as models of proper and acceptable jurors down to the present time. Only two crimes, murder and treason, were punishable by death. There was no gallows in Pennsylvania so long as Penn lived; but then Penn didn't have the Mollie Maguires to pacify.

Penn advertised his land at forty shillings per hundred acres, and a little quit-rent, and the tide of immigration set in. Franz Pastorius came over at once with a company of Germans, and bought 15,000 acres, and invented the Pennsylvania-Dutch language, of which anybody can, without any instruction, understand three fifths, and nobody can understand the other two fifths.

Three vessels came over during this year. One of them was frozen in at Chester, then the Swedish settlement of Upland, and here the immigrants passed the winter, living in caves which they dug in the river-bank.* Colonel Markham, Penn's cousin and lieutenant, came out to take charge of the colony. He also brought a long letter from Penn, to read to the Indians, to see how they would stand that sort of thing. The reading was not attended with any fatal results.

In the mean time Penn was settling the clashing interests of proprietorship between himself, the Duke of York, and Lord Baltimore. These differences were temporarily adjusted, as usual in these little deals, in Penn's favor and to his great advantage. The thermometer was a foot and a half below zero when Penn missed the train. But this adjustment did not stay adjusted, and eventually Penn got left.

* Why they did not go to the hotels, of which there are several in Chester, or go up to Philadelphia by rail, does not appear. It is very probable the immigrants were out of money and were waiting at Chester for remittances.

This year his mother died. Penn's affectionate nature so keenly felt this blow that for several days he was ill and unable to bear the light, and it was many weeks before his usual habits of activity returned to him. But when the edge of the great Quaker's sorrow was blunted, and life and its duties called him from his grief, all his heart went out again to the "Holy Experiment," his model republic in the new world, his colony where the government and the people, the law and religion, should go hand in hand, mutually dependent and mutually helpful. (And the sound of the Indian wigwam was heard in the distance.)

CHAPTER V.

GO WEST, YOUNG MAN.

"FRIEND WILLIAM," remarked the Merry Monarch, if the historian of the Third Reader is to be credited,* "I suppose you are going to make sure the Indians will not shed a drop of your Quaker blood, by remaining in England, where it is far more likely to be shed by the headsman of the established church."

"Which," replied the Quaker chieftain, with mild sarcasm, "is where thee is away off thy base. I am even now ready to sail, and am come to bid thee ta-ta."

"What! venture yourself among the savages of North America? Why, man, what security have you that you'll not be in their war-kettle in two hours after setting foot upon their shores?"

("The best security in the world," replied Penn, calmly,—"a first mortgage on every foot

of ground my particular savages own; a regular cut-throat, that I can shut down on them any time I please.")

"Nixie weeden," replied the King, "I have no idea of any security against those cannibals but in a regiment of good soldiers with their muskets and bayonets. And I tell you beforehand, with all my good-will to you and your family, now there is no more prospect for my borrowing money of you, I'll not send a single soldier with you. If things keep on as they are now, I shall need them all myself pretty suddenly."

"I want none of thy soldiers," answered Penn, pleasantly; "if I need troops, I can call out the State Fencibles and wipe the ground with anything that ever wore a scarlet coat. But I depend upon something better than thy soldiers."

The King wanted to know if he meant peace commissioners.

"Why, no, I depend upon themselves," replied Penn, "on their own moral sense and inward goodness."

"That's all well enough," replied the King, "but Phil Sheridan says the only good Indian is a dead one."

"Phil Sheridan is a man of war," said the Quaker. "When thy subjects first went to North America they found these poor people the fondest and kindest creatures in the world. Every day they would watch for them to come ashore, and hasten to meet them and feast them on their best fish and venison, and corn, and oysters so big that it took two men to swallow a small one. In return for this hospitality of the savages, as we call them, thy subjects, termed Christians, seized their best hunting-grounds and opened them up to preëmption under the Homestead and Bounty acts, located mining-claims all over their mountains, and, in open disregard of all treaty obligations, forced them upon wretched alkali reservations not fit for a goose-pasture, until in desperation these much-injured people followed Captain Jack to the lava-beds and rode over the border with Sitting Bull, and went into the human-hair business with limited capital but unbounded enthusiasm and enterprise."

"Well, then, I hope, friend William, you will not complain when 'Old-Man-Down-on-the-Quakers' lifts your flowing locks and makes you at once a subject for the hatter, the wig-maker, and the coroner."

"Mighty clear of the murder," said Penn. "When I come back to England I shall have hair of my own to sell."

"In your mind you will," replied the King, with his ready wit, "but I suppose you mean to jump their hunting-grounds, like the rest of us?"

"Yes, but not by any swindling act of Congress or miserable land-grab," said the honest Friend; "I mean to buy their lands of them."

The King looked at William in a tone of astonishment for a moment, then he compressed his lips firmly, bulged out his cheeks, protruded his chin, and sank down on a cracker-box, smiting his knees and swaying to and fro with suppressed laughter. When he recovered from this burst of royal merriment, he said,

"Why, man, you have bought their lands already, of me!"

"I know that," replied the gentle Quaker, "but that was because I knew I could never get a dollar of my just claims out of thee in any other way. I only paid for thy good-will. What right had thee to the land?"

"Right?" exclaimed his most gracious majesty,—"the cleanest title you ever saw on parchment; runs clear back to a government patent. Here: beginning at the northeastern bound of the Ashburton treaty, thence running southwest to a port in Key West, thence westerly to a tree at the mouth of the Rio Grande, thence across the country and so on up and around back to the place of beginning. You find a flaw in that title, and I'll give you a stock-farm in Iowa. Of course it's my land. I discovered it. Or at least some other man did, and I took it away from him."

"The right of discovery," said Penn, "doesn't hold good in this court. Suppose, friend Charles, some canoe-loads of these Indians should cross the sea and discover thy islands of Great Britain? What would thee do, sell out or vacate?"

To which the King very truthfully replied that he would sell out his whole kingdom any time to the first man that bid high enough, and if the Indians were big enough and strong enough he would vacate by the first steamer that sailed for France. "That is the kind of monarch I am," he added, "but you needn't tell people I said so. But," he continued earnestly, "I have heard the Indians are great thieves, and will steal anything they can carry away, if it doesn't grow fast to the ground. Look after your doors and keep your hand on your lock."

"What lock?" asked the unsuspecting Friend.

"Scalp-lock!" shouted the witty monarch in a burst of merriment,—"tra-la-la, William!"

"See you later," muttered the discomfited Quaker, as he followed his precious hat out of the royal apartments.

Penn bade his family an affectionate farewell, and wrote his wife and children a long letter, containing nearly four thousand words, which filled them plumb full of good advice and commercial and moral and practical instruction. He bade Mrs. Penn "be diligent in meetings for worship and business; stir up thyself and others herein;" "make thy family matters easy to thee;" to have regular hours "for work, walking, and meals," and "grieve not thyself with careless servants; rather pay them and let them go,"—which shows that the housekeeper's struggle with the queen of the kitchen was raging and wearing out mothers and wives and breaking crystal and chipping fine china and scouring silver with sand and yellow soap even in the wealthy families away back in Penn's time. "Cast up thy income, and I beseech thee to live low and sparingly till my debts are paid." * He lays out her amusements for her. "Guard against encroaching friendships, ... and let thy children, good meetings, and Friends be the pleasure of thy life."† He bade her "spare no cost" in the education of the children, "for by such parsimony all is lost that is saved." "Let my children be husbandmen and housewives." He preferred they should have a private tutor, who could toot in the house, "rather than send them to schools," where they would learn too many things he didn't want them to know.‡ He bade his children "obey, love, and cherish your dear mother;" if they marry, to do so with her consent. "I charge you, help the poor and needy; let the Lord have a voluntary share of your income for the poor, both in your own society and others." There was never anything small or narrow about William Penn.§ "Love not money or the world," he told them; "use them only, and they will serve you." "In making friends, consider well first, and when you are fixed, be true, not wavering in reports, nor deserting in affliction." "As for you who are likely to be concerned in the government of Pennsylvania, I do charge you that you be lowly, diligent, and tender, fearing God, loving the people, and hating covetousness. Keep upon the square."* "Finally, my dear children, love one another and your dear relations on both sides, and take care to preserve tender affection in your children to each other, often marrying within themselves, so as it be without the bounds forbidden in God's law, that they may not grow out of kindred and cold as strangers."†

On the 1st of September he sailed in the good ship Welcome with one hundred passengers, nearly all Friends, and his old neighbors of Sussex County. They enjoyed a very miserable voyage. It lasted six weeks, and the small-pox broke out. Of the hundred passengers thirty died at sea, and before the voyage was half completed every passenger on the Welcome was sick. For thirty hours, on one occasion, the burial service never ceased. With no fear and no thought for himself, Penn moved through the dark, narrow cabins, crowded with death and suffering, and the brightest qualities of his manhood and Christianity shone forth in the presence of that loathsome pestilence.* At length, after the horrors of disease and death had made the weeks drag their weary lengths along like slow-moving months, the Welcome dropped anchor off Newcastle, and the Dutch and Swedes welcomed the new Governor most cordially when he stepped ashore.

* Can it be possible that William Penn was the man who killed Morgan? It seems that he was a Mason and a goat-rider.

† Penn realized how much easier it would be for his boys to marry their cousins, and arrange matters with their uncles, whose peculiarities they knew, and with whose dogs they were on friendly and speaking terms, than to meet strange fathers-in-law and brindle terriers that they knew not of, and to whom an introduction would be fraught with perilous formalities.

Having hired a hall, Penn unloaded a long speech upon the defenceless inhabitants, a custom that prevails with American Governors even unto the present day, with the exceptions, indeed, of the Governors of North Carolina and South Carolina, one of whom is reported as being very brief but very pointed in his remarks, while the speech of the other has never been reported.

* This was before the discovery of vaccination.

The commissions of all the magistrates at Newcastle were renewed, whereupon the incumbents passed resolutions advocating civil-service reform and endorsing the administration, while the citizens who had expected commissions and didn't get them viewed with alarm the growing power of the "machine," and grieved to see that the new administration was making itself solid with the "bosses."

Penn then went to Chester, where he must have been surprised to see the Crozier Theological Seminary for Baptists, and the Pennsylvania Military Academy.* The town was then settled by Swedes, who called their village Upland. Penn, however, changed the name to Chester, because that was the town his friend Pearson came from. The wonderful strength of will and marvellous unselfishness in Penn's character is shown in the fact that he refrained from changing the name to Pearsonborough or Pennholder or Williamville, after the usual American plan.

While he waited in Chester the Assembly of Pennsylvania held its first session, which lasted only four days. This brevity was owing in great measure to an excellent rule adopted by both houses, "that none speak but once before the question is put, nor after, but once, and that superfluous and tedious speeches may be stopped by the Speaker." *

* As he says nothing about them, it is probable that he didn't see them.

Among other important laws that they passed after adopting Penn's constitution was one that every child twelve years of age, rich or poor, should be instructed in some useful trade or skill, all work being honorable, and idleness a shame.

Having founded a great state with less noise and talk than is usually occupied in organizing a debating society, the Assembly adjourned, and the honorable members collected their per diem and went back to their farms at their own expense, the duty of distributing annual passes to the members having not yet occurred to the Pennsylvania Railroad.

After the adjournment of the Assembly Penn visited the Governors of New York and Maryland, delivering a few sermons here and there, as occasion offered. He was well satisfied with his own colony and province. The soil was fertile, "provision good and easy to come at," he writes; the woods were full of game and the rivers full of fish; "oysters were six inches long," and still growing; wild turkeys flew so low and in such crowds "they could be killed with a stick," and some of the big ones "weighed 46 pounds."* A deer sold for two shillings; "wild pigeons were also killed with sticks;" there were "plenty of swans," and "peaches by cart-loads." An enterprising proprietor of a summer hotel, at that time, embodied these facts in his circular. That same circular has been used by all summer hotels since his time, and the copy has never been changed.†

* This rule is not now in force in the legislative assemblies of the United States.

Penn now looked around for a good place for the capital of his province. There was a strong lobby in favor of Chester, the oldest town in Pennsylvania, but all the best town lots in Chester were already sold or in the hands of speculators. Penn's æsthetic eye was caught by the beautiful country at the junction of the Schuylkill and Delaware. Some one told him that the Indian name of the Schuylkill was Manajung, to which the noble Friend replied that he was Manajung this thing himself, and he'd call the creek anything he pleased. Three Swedes owned the land Penn wanted for his capital, and hearing that he was very anxious to buy, they told him that real estate was away up and still booming, and they unloaded their farms on him at a margin that made them laugh in their sleep for a week afterward.

Then Penn laid out his city.* "Keep on the square," he had written to his sons, and he was determined to make it a very hard matter for them to get off it, whenever they came to town. He took a straight ruler and a sheet of paper and laid out his city. He drew a parallelogram two miles long and one mile wide. "There," he said proudly, "if you want to see something pretty in the way of a city, look at that." In the centre of this parallelogram he located a square of ten acres, and in each of the four quarters one of eight acres, for public parks, wisely foreseeing that some accommodations would have to be provided for the tramps, along in 1882.) Two wide streets fronted the rivers; running from the Schuylkill to the Delaware nine streets were laid out, crossed by twenty-one running north and south. Of the nine east and west streets, High Street was a broad avenue, one hundred feet wide; it is now called Market, and the "lines of trees" that were to fringe it in lasting ornament and shade have given place to double tracks of street railways.* The streets running parallel to High were named Vine, Sassafras, Mulberry, Chestnut, Walnut, Spruce, Pine, and Cedar. Sassafras is now called Race, and Mulberry answers to the name of Arch. Broad Street, one hundred and thirteen feet wide, crossed Market at right angles, and divided the city in two, north and south. All other streets were to be fifty feet in width.

Penn thought he had plenty of room for a large city, with a small forest in front of every man's house and a kitchen-garden in the back yard. His dreams of Philadelphia were the only small things about him. The incorporated city of Philadelphia grew out of Penn's little parallelogram, two miles long and one mile wide, until it included the entire county, a territory twenty-three miles in length with an average width of five and a half miles, an area of 129½ square miles, and a population of 800,000 inhabitants. One part of his beloved city did not grow, however. The ten-acre park at the intersection of Broad and High streets did not catch the boom. It began to dwindle and fade away; shrank down to Penn Square at last, and has finally been entirely obliterated and filled up with the new city buildings, which will be completed about 1892. The other four squares still exist, while the pride of Penn's city is Fairmount Park, which Penn forgot to lay out, now unsurpassed by any public park in America, containing nearly three thousand acres. There were several other things Penn forgot to put in his city, which the descendants of his colonists have since attended to for him.

But Penn's town grew and prospered. The Indians called it "Co-a-que-na-que," but Penn didn't want to feel as though he was giving out hard words at an Indiana spelling-school every time he spoke the name of his city, so he called it Philadelphia.* He displayed his originality and versatility in the christening of his towns. He guarded his government carefully against the errors of the New England codes and intolerance, and he avoided with equal care the New England system of nomenclature. But for this, after he named the first town in his province Chester, he would have called Philadelphia New Chester, and the succeeding settlements North Chester, South Chester, Chester Centre, Chester Upper Falls, East Chester, West Chester, Chester Corners, Chester Lower Falls, Chester Port, Port Chester, Chester Village, Chester Station, Chesterville, Chestertown, Chester City, Chester Court House, Chester Cross Roads, Chester Land, Chester Siding, Chester Intersection, Chester Landing, Mount Chester, Chester Bridge, and Chest-around-the-corner. Happily for posterity, Penn saw where that sort of a thing was liable to run if it once got started.

* "Why do you call your town Philadelphia?" asked Charles, on Penn's return to England. "Because that is its name," answered the thoughtful Quaker. The King looked at him steadfastly, and then remarking, "That's on me," left the room to conceal his emotion, while Penn threw himself on the floor and laughed till his hat fell off.

Immigrants crowded to the Quaker City long before there was any place to put them. The new-comers lived in caves on the banks of the Schuylkill, or abode and made their soup under the broad canopy of heaven until they could build houses. The Blue Anchor Tavern was the first building completed in Philadelphia, built by a man named Guest, who was its first landlord. This house had twelve feet front on the river and ran back twenty-two feet, to Dock Street, and was tavern, corn-market, board of trade, ferry-house, post-office, steamboat wharf, Pennsylvania depot, and Centennial buildings, in its time. There was a cottage already standing on the site of Philadelphia, built some years before by a man named Drinker,* but it wasn't built in Philadelphia, Philadelphia was built around it. Other houses were built near Guest's. Twenty-three ships, freighted with colonists, came up the Delaware the year of Penn's landing, and more were continually arriving. Stone houses were built, "with pointed roofs, balconies, and porches;" a post-office and a star mail-route, "unexpedited," were established within a year. Enoch Flower opened school in December, and taught boys and girls to "read for four shillings a quarter; to write, six shillings; boarding, washing, lodging, diet, and schooling, ten pounds the whole year,"—flogging, gratis and regular.

The colony was a remarkable success. "I must, without vanity," Penn wrote to Lord Halifax, "say I have led the greatest colony into America that ever any man did on private credit."

And though he said it who should not say it, it was the truth.

CHAPTER VI.

UNDER THE BIG ELM.

JUST about this time the curtain was rung up for the grand transformation scene, and the full strength of the entire ballet, with William Penn as premier, appeared in the great Treaty Act. The date is a little indefinite. One authority places it on October 14, 1682; another says it was near the close of November, 1682; still another says it was in 1682, but with cautious self-restraint ventures on no particular date; one writer also allows this famous treaty the liberty of the entire year; (yet another historian generously gives his readers the privilege of dating it to suit themselves, any time between the destruction of Babylon and the completion of the Washington Monument.) The Pennsylvania Historical Society, (the best of all authorities, with the one exception of the valuable and accurate volume now in the hands of the delighted reader,) fixes the date of the treaty in October, 1682.

It will be borne in mind that, prior to 1752, the innumerable insurance calendars and countless tons of American medical almanacs for gratuitous distribution by all respectable druggists were not printed, and the English people, both in the mother-country and the colonies, had no knowledge of the proper division of the year, and lived and died under the ghastly illusion that New Year's day fell on the first of March, and the year beginning at that time threw the Fourth of July on the fourth of September. In one "Life of Penn" this appalling ignorance of our ancestors has evidently bothered the biographer, who speaks of the "6th month" in Penn's time as June, and in consequence has him "sailing before the midsummer's smoky breeze" along in October or November. In this present work, it being the official standard of the Pennsylvania Historical Society and the Society of Friends, the greatest attention has been paid to dates, and people who discover any errors in it are earnestly requested to correct them by annotations on their own copies of the biography, and not to trouble the publisher or author about them, or to rush into the newspapers with wrathful cards signed "Constant Reader" and "Old Subscriber," which no man ever reads save only the proof-reader,—and he has to be paid for it, or he wouldn't.)

There are no contemporary accounts of this treaty. Bearing this fact in mind, remembering that no historical record of what was said and done at this treaty, nor where it was held, nor when, was made at the time, the reader is often surprised at the vast amount of information possessed on these points by modern history. But that is a way modern history has. Indian legends and Quaker traditions, handed down by word of mouth from one generation to another, have given historians all the suggestions and data from which their lively imaginations could manufacture the necessary facts. (However, some valuable old manuscripts, quite recently discovered, and, in fact, written by the able and painstaking author of this work for the express purpose of throwing light and trustworthy information upon this subject,) have added largely to our hitherto meagre array of established facts in connection with this treaty.

As to the place, although there are men who claim that the treaty was held at Chester and various other points, the better authorities locate it on the spot now marked by an alleged "monument," in Kensington. Kensington is English for Shackamaxon. "Colonel Markham had already appointed this locality for his first conference with the Indians," says Dixon, "and the land commissioners wisely followed his example. Old traditions had made the place sacred to one of the contracting parties, and when Penn proposed his solemn conference, he named Shackamaxon as a matter of course for its locality." *

Wherever and whenever this treaty was made and signed, it is well known that Penn had been posing for it from the day he landed at Chester. He made himself popular † with the Indians. He sat at their feasts, passed his plate for more baked dog, and affected to like Indian cookery. He ate parched acorns and hominy. And when any man, not being impelled thereto by the pangs of starvation, can, deliberately and in cold blood, eat hominy, that man is too much for an acre of Indians. The Indians were overjoyed when they saw him eat hominy, it being the first time any white man had been able to devour that luxury and live.* After this inhuman repast, the savages began to jump, and Penn joined them in this pastime. He made a few easy jumps, until he spurred the longest-legged man in the tribe to do his best. Then William arose. He took off his long single-breasted cut-away coat with many buttons, but kept on his hat. He toed the mark carefully and, with a brick in each hand, began swinging his arms to and fro with measured rhythm. The guileless Indians had never before seen a man jump with the weights, and these swaying bricks were a novelty to them. While they gathered close around him, they could see, by the superhuman gravity of his severe countenance and the measured manner in which he lifted himself on his toes every time the bricks came back, that he was getting ready for the "boss jump."† Suddenly the stately figure crowned with the broad-brim hat rose in the air like a premature balloon ascension, and the two bricks went flying into the unsuspecting crowd, knocking down a sachem and two medicine-men and creating the most intense excitement and wildest confusion, taking advantage of which Penn ran two or three steps after he jumped, then balanced himself on his heels and cried, "Looky! looky here!" The untutored children of the forest marked the break of his heels, and his supposed jump measured 37 feet 8½ inches. The Indians were wild with admiration and amazement. One envious brave, indeed, offered to bet a wampum and a half he couldn't do it again without the bricks, but it afterward appeared that he had been hit in the eye with one of them, and was accordingly prejudiced.

* Penn did not know that the proper name of this suburb was Kensington.

† In Lenni-Lenape dialect, "solid."

Shackamaxon, with its elm-tree and its great treaty, has been the theme of bard and chronicler and painter, and, faithfully painted from the various historical descriptions of the scene, the picture would indeed be impressive and varied as a mince-pie-and-cider nightmare. From various well-known, careful, and widely accepted authorities I quote:

"After sailing this day, as aforesaid, about forty miles before the midsummer's smoky breeze, . . . he beheld two Indian villages near the water." "It is near the close of November," on which day, "October 14th, a scene took place which history has made memorable." "As if purposely formed to be the theatre of that memorable event, an elm-tree of extraordinary size lifted high its towering top, and from its giant arms threw far and wide a refreshing shade over many a grassy acre." * "Under the wide-branching elm the Indian tribes are assembled, but all unarmed." "Marching to and fro in their military dresses, armed with bows and arrows." "The Indians threw down their bows and arrows, and seated themselves around their chiefs," for "they came in large numbers, armed and painted."

Out of all this confusion and contradiction, it is refreshing to walk into the light of more painstaking, elaborate, and modern research. Undoubtedly it was in November, 1682, when this treaty took place. The elm-tree was there, but its shade was not necessary. Penn could keep shady enough in a land trade, without the assistance of any elm-tree. He was there, and Solomon in all his glory never wore such Quaker clothes. A "hat of the cavalier shape, but without the feather," a coat that reached to his knees and was "covered with buttons," a vest only about two sizes smaller than the coat, also suffering from an irruption of buttons; "trousers extremely full, slashed at the sides and tied with strings or ribbons;" "a profusion of shirt-sleeves and ruffles," and a "sky-blue sash tied round his waist." He wore his hair long and curled, as usual, and was in his thirty-eighth year, "the handsomest, best-looking, most lively gentleman," Mrs. Preston says, she had ever seen. All Penn's biographers agree in denouncing Benjamin West's portrait of him, in his painting of this scene, as a wretched burlesque, in which Penn appears as an "ugly fat old fellow, with the costumes half a century out of date."

* A refreshing shade on a grassy acre was a very necessary concomitant of an out-door meeting on the Delaware late in November. To this shade we owe the fact that no one was sunstruck at this treaty.

William was accompanied by Colonel Markham, his friend Pearson, and a company of Friends and sailors bearing post-sutler stores and trader's goods. For the first and about the only time since so-called Christian monarchs and alleged Christian commanders had occupied America, unarmed Christians showed their trust in God and their belief in his word by meeting his savage children with the extended hand of amity, without a smell of powder on it, and a proffer of friendship uncoupled with a demand for all the land between New Jersey and the Mississippi river.

The Indians were there. Three tribes at least were represented by delegates who were present in the convention—the Lenni Lenape, the Mingoes, and the Shawnees. Letters of regret, conveying their cordial sympathy with the object of the convention, and expressing their entire willingness to serve in any position to which the voice of the people might call them, were received from "Old-man-holding-his-land-for-a-rise," "Sitting Hen," "Young-man-with-a-farm-in-the-Oil-Country," "Theeanthou-nobody," "Dontchuwishucould," "Man-with-his-eye-on-a-rail-road," and "Old-man-who-sold-land-to-white-people-once-before." Several of the absent statesmen did, indeed, say they had no land to sell, but they had a fine assortment of flint spear and arrow heads they would gladly exchange for undressed human hair of European brands—English preferred.

The Indian delegates who were present were largely arrayed in paint and feathers, and as they squatted on the ground around their chiefs they looked like the front door of a Western wagon-shop—a breathing nocturne in red and yellow. Approaching Penn with the easy grace of a man who has had his own way all his life, the Sachem-in-chief, the great Taminend,* whose name, in the Lenni-Lenape language, signifies "Man-who-puts-on-a-good-deal-of-dog," extended his hand and said,

"How?"

He then withdrew his hand, and appeared very much surprised on finding nothing in it. The stately savage retired a few paces, sat down, and put his hand around to his hip.

"Look out," said Colonel Markham, "he's feeling for a pistol." And then he stepped behind his stately cousin, remarking, "We will die together."

Instead of a pistol, however, the Sachem drew from his pocket a sort of head-stall or chaplet, on which was fastened a small horn, the emblem of sovereign power and authority, the wearing of which made the occasion and the locality sacred and inviolate.

"I always take a horn before I make a trade," said the Sachem. This was his little joke, at which all Indians owning his sovereignty were compelled to laugh twice a year.

Penn having caught the eye of the Speaker now obtained the floor, and addressed the house on the subject of the Pennsylvania land bill. He held in his hand a roll of parchment purporting to be the treaty of amity and purchase, but which was really the manuscript of his extempore speech. A deathlike stillness pervaded the assembly, only broken by the mellow notes of the distant war-whoops that the little Indian children were trundling in Fairmount Park. Penn cleared his throat, chewed a troche, and said,

"Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen—"

At this point he was interrupted by a Mingo sachem, who rose to a point of order and said,

"Mr. Speaker, does not the honorable gentleman speak the Mingo language?"

Penn replied that he knew the tune very well, but he didn't know the words. The Court then informed him that he would have to provide an interpreter at his own expense, as the Mingoes were there first, and held the age on the language.

An interpreter was then secured, and Penn resumed:

"Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen: I am—er ah—I am—ha, h'm—I am not—I am—I am sensible—ha, unaccustomed as I am to—ha, public speaking—ha. Er ah—Brothers, listen."

Old-man-with-cotton-in-his-ears to Interpreter—"What is he saying?"

Interpreter—"Blowed if I know."

William Penn—"But again! Brothers, listen! We are all brothers!" (Derisive laughter from the squaws.) "That is—er um—and sisters." (Derisive laughter and cries of "Oh, oh!" from the braves.) "To resume! We are all children together, of one family, and we must love one another."

Interpreter—"He is now giving us confectionery."

William Penn—"There is no need for us to quarrel. The world is big enough for us all; for the red brothers and the white brothers, too. And there is fish, and deer, and turkeys, and corn, and oysters, and planked shad, and soup, and beans, and beef, for us all."

Young-man-not-afraid-of-the-vial to Interpreter—"Didn't he say anything about rum?"

Interpreter—"Don't talk back. No, he hasn't got down to business yet."

William Penn—"Therefore, if at any time the red men or the white men—"

A Shawnee delegate—"Ask him if this is a chess problem he is giving us?"

William Penn, corrected by the Interpreter—"If the red brothers see anything the white brothers have that they want, or vice versa" (loud cries of "Construe! construe!"), "they must not fight and take it away. Oh no, that would be very naughty. And, besides, before I get through with thee, I'll show thee how to get all thee wants from an Indian without fighting about it."

"What does he mean by that, and why does the brother lay the palm of his forefinger on the side of his nose and close one eye?" asked a delegate from the Delaware nation.

"He says," replied the Interpreter, "that you will understand him better when you grow older, and he holds his finger that way because his memory is poor."

"Ugh! Tell him to go on with the racket."

William Penn resumed: "Moreover, if we fight, thee will get left."

A Mingo delegate—"Please ask him to demonstrate that hypothesis."

William Penn—"With pleasure. Thy own eyes see our canoes yonder." (Cries of "Oh, oh!" and caustic requests for the Speaker to explain to the gentleman the difference between a ship and a canoe.) "Now, you see our canoes are bigger than thy canoes, and our bows and arrows—"

Interpreter—"He means guns, but he seems to be a little off in his vocabulary to-day. He means all right."

William Penn—"Our bows and arrows send out thunder and lightning. (Nothing can stand before them."

Old-man-with-his-arm-in-a-sling—"No, and nobody could stand behind those Dutch muskets we took away from the Swedes last winter.) Tell him I'd rather be shot at with some of his thunder and lightning than touch it off."

William Penn—"We could easily kill thee with our bows and arrows, and take thy land."

Interpreter—"Young-man-with-a-patch-on-his-eye wishes me to say that perhaps you would like to come out to the lava-beds and try that on, if you think it's so easy. He says he's heard white men talk that way before, but they took good care to keep off the reservation all the same."

William Penn—"That's all right; but my red brother is here, and I am not going to the lava-beds. Brothers, I and my people are not mouth-slappers and bad men from Oshkosh. We do not carry razors in our boots. We are not come to hurt thee."

Interpreter—"The big Indian with the bear-claw necklace and his ears painted black says, 'You're right, you don't look very dangerous.' He's an awful bad Indian. Cut a man at a dance last Friday night, and has served two terms in Moyamensing."

William Penn—"We are met on the broad pathway of good faith and good will, so that no advantage is to be taken on either side. I will not call you children or brothers, as the Marylanders did, for Heaven forbid I should do anything like a Marylander, because it's a wise father in these days that can keep even with his son or prevent his daughter from marrying the hostler. Neither will I compare the friendship between us to a chain, which the passing tramp or the casual Indian may bear away to the nearest junk-shop. But I will consider you the same flesh and blood with ourselves, just as though one man's body were divided into two parts."

"Tell him," remarked an old Indian painted in three colors, and wearing only one ear and no scalp, "Tell him I have seen, and not far away from this pleasant land, down here in Virginia, one man's body divided into as many parts as there were Injuns in the crowd who could get at him, and he didn't seem to be a very happy man either."

"And tell him," said a young sachem in his bare head and with three bear-skin patches in the epilogue of his buckskin ulster, "to open his kiesters and show up his samples. We can talk when it's too dark to do anything else."

"And now, in conclusion," said William Penn, "for time flies and money is twelve per cent, I'll tell thee what I'll do with thee.

We didn't come here to rob thee, and I didn't come here to-day to deal in real estate at all. but if thee has any land thee wants to sell, I'll make thee an offer as square as a horse-trade. I don't want to beat thee out of a foot of ground, and I don't want to buy to-day, but if thee is anxious to sell, I'll give right here, cash and goods right down on the counter, five hundred dollars for the state of Pennsylvania, with all the dips, spurs, angles, leads, sinuosities, stock, fixtures, good-will and other appurtenances thereunto appertaining."

"They want you," explained the Interpreter, "to make it five hundred and a half."

"Couldn't do it," replied Penn. "I won't make a dollar out of it at five hundred dollars. I've paid sixteen thousand pounds for it now, to a man that never owned a foot of it."

"He wants to know, Onas," * said the Interpreter, when a sachem finished speaking, "if you paid sixteen thousand pounds for the state to a land-grabber who couldn't give you a deed,

* "Onas" was the nearest the Indians could get to Penn's name. Onas, in their own sweet tongue, meant a quill, and quill-pens were the only kind in use among the Indians. Although why it wasn't just as easy to say Penn, even with two n's, as Onas, no one but an Indian could tell.

if you think it's a square deal to offer the rightful owners only five hundred dollars to quiet title?"

(And the silence that fell on the assembly was so profound you might have heard a gumdrop.)

CHAPTER VII.

THE PIONEER LAND-OFFICE.

RECOVERING from the momentary embarrassment into which the irrelevant question of the untutored savage had thrown him, William hastened to explain that he hadn't really paid one continental dollar for the province as yet. That a man—his most gracious majesty the King, in fact—owed him 16,000 pounds, and he knew he was never going to get a shilling of it. And, somehow, the King had the same kind of presentiment, and when Penn took this land for that debt, it was tacitly understood on both sides that the King hadn't lost a nickel, while it was the softest thing for the Quaker that could happen. Moreover, Penn assured the sachems that he didn't come there to make a real-estate deal. He had royal letters patent, right there in his pocket, conveying to William Penn, himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to have and to hold, for better or worse, be the same more or less, all and several, that part of North America lying between New Jersey, Maryland, the Ohio river and lake Erie, as hereinafter described by metes and bounds as follows, to wit, namely, viz.; being a tract or parcel of land 300 miles long and 160 miles wide, and containing 47,000 square miles, being a trifle smaller than the kingdom of England.

The Indians weakened when they heard this, and said they wouldn't stay in, but Penn again assured them it was not his intention to take a mean advantage of them. He did not come over in the Mayflower, but he believed in paying an Indian for his land before you converted him with a musket and then took his land because he died intestate. He just wanted them to sign this treaty of friendship, which would relieve both sides from the expense of a standing army, and ratify the purchases already made and the legal validity of the King's letters patent in order to quiet his title, and they would talk real estate some other time. This was satisfactory to the Indians; with much perspiration and many blots and smears, and much thrusting out of the tongue, the Indians signed the treaty, and quit-claimed the Keystone State to William Penn for $515.50, with the understanding that they should have the privilege of selling it all over to him again, from time to time, in separate tracts. Among the articles for which the Indians quit-claimed their rights to the state, Friend Weems enumerates "20 guns," worth $7 each, a $7 gun being considered the safest possible kind of gun for the white man, in the hands of an Indian.* Then followed "20 fathoms of match coat," whatever that is, and "20 fathoms of stroud water," supposed to be something for the hair or handkerchief; "40 tomahawks," to be used in killing other Indians only; "100 bars of lead," to afford youthful Indians the means of securing admission to the circus; "100 knives," worth 25 cents each, and therefore presumably "Barlows;" "30 glass bottles;"† "30 pewter spoons" (not marked; probably from the groom's mother); "100 awl-blades" (accompanied by a copy of "Every Indian his own Shoemaker"); "300 tobacco pipes," without instruction; "100 hands of tobacco," Lancaster County best; "30 combs,"* which were used by the gentle savages as implements of torture on their unhappy prisoners of war; "1 barrel of beer;"† "20 hoes" for the women; "100 Jews-harps,"—just paint in your mind the astonishing spectacle of one hundred sons of the forest, sitting on a stake-and-rider fence, their faces drawn into contortions of ecstasy, their teeth firmly set on the jaws of the loud-sounding Jews-harps, their right hands swinging with the rhythm of an orchestral movement, pelting the lambient air with the melting strains of "Camptown Races," better known in their own soft dialect as "doo-dah." Truly, William Penn's head was not hilly when he put in those Jews-harps. ("Music hath charms to soothe a savage," he said, and so we put a brass band around the bulldog's neck.) There were, furthermore, "100 strings of beads" and "30 wooden screw-boxes;"‡ a "skipple of salt;"§ "40 pairs of stockings," which the proud savages wore for gloves;

* ! ! !   † For three tribes of Indians!   ‡ ?

§ A skipple was twice as much as a boodle, and two bongles made a boodle. A skipple of salt was therefore half a dingle.

"20 tobacco tongs," the finiky Indians having the most intense dislike to handling tobacco with their fingers.

In addition to the articles above specified, there were blankets, kettles, powder, flints, steels, red lead, tobacco-boxes, gimlets, molasses, (five gallons !), needles, wampum, and "30 pairs of scissors." No mention is made of rocking-chairs, glove-stretchers, or shoe-buttoners, and it is probable that the poor savages of Penn's time were compelled to drag out a lingering existence, uncheered by the presence of these common necessities of life.

Sachem Taminend, Tamanen, or Taminent, as the case may be, made a brief address at the close of the treaty, which was marked with the beautiful imagery and natural thrilling eloquence that are so characteristic of Indian oratory. He assured Penn that he was a very large Indian. "I am," he said, pumping his right arm up and down like a walking-beam,—an effective and graceful gesture taught him by a member of the British Parliament,—"I am half hoss and half alligator; I am a raging volcano of wrath when anybody pulls my hair, and I will strike the side of a mountain if the soup is burned. I am a bad Indian, and I carry a gun. I hunt in the mountains, stranger; I sleep on the prairie; I eat raw buffalo, and I drink out of the Mississippi. Wagh!"

And the famous treaty was consummated—so famous, so much written about, so little known; unrecorded and undying: imposing with the grandeur of simplicity; kingly in the majesty of pure manhood; glorious in the white raiment of practical Christianity; the Sermon on the Mount embodied in the Quaker's treaty. There needs no record of its details to make it live in history. The simple fact that the treaty was made, the plain, Quaker-like truth, unadorned by flowers of rhetoric or clinging tendrils of speech, is enough to hand down to all posterity the beautiful story of "the only treaty," says Voltaire, "made without an oath and never broken."

It has been the proud boast of the followers of William Penn, and the fact is even recorded by Bancroft, that "no drop of Quaker blood was ever shed by an Indian in Pennsylvania." Ah, if only some red-skinned Bancroft, painting in weird hieroglyphs, in brilliant coloring and doubtful perspective, on the buckskin walls of his smoky tepee the history of this treaty for his race, could but say so much for the fidelity of the white man! Alas! forty years after pale-face and red-skin declared "their friendship should endure while waters ran down the rivers and the sun and stars endured," an unworthy follower of Penn murdered the first Indian slain in Pennsylvania, and even then, faithful to their pledge given at that treaty, the Indians interceded for the murderer, and begged that, as he was a child of Onas, his life might be spared. The Indians have got over that feeling now, and so oft as opportunity presents they lift the hair of their white brother without any investigation into his standing in the religious community. In fact, the Indian of to-day rather prefers fighting a man who won't fight back.

The great elm-tree at Kensington stood until 1810, when it was blown down, having lived to see the treaty which made it famous broken into as many fragments as there were white men in Pennsylvania. It lived through the years of bloodshed and murder that rolled up and down the beautiful valley of Wyoming; it lived to see the scalping-knife and tomahawk of the Indian allies of his most gracious and Christian majesty George III., defender of the faith, make life a burden to the Pennsylvanian, and then relieve him of the burden; it lived to see William Penn wronged, swindled, and almost beggared by his pretended friend, his trusted secretary, a Friend of his own faith; it lived to see the great Quaker cast into prison in his old age; it lived to see his son disgrace the name of his honored father and die a victim of his own excesses and wickedness, and it had seen enough. It was 283 years old, 24 feet in girth, and its main branch was 150 feet long. During the British occupation of Philadelphia, in the Revolutionary war, this tree was still held in such reverence that the English General Simcoe placed a guard about it, to protect it from parties of soldiers sent out after fire-wood.

When the old tree fell, it was utilized after the American fashion. A few cords of it were sent to the Penn family in England; an arm-chair was made from it and placed in the Commissioners' Hall in Kensington. Hundreds of thousands of work-stands, vases, paper-weights, knife-handles, paper-cutters, etc., were made from the remainder of it. During the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia in 1876, a new impetus was given to the manufacture of the great elm relics, and several planing-mills had all they could do to supply the demand. Probably there never was a tree so remarkable for its versatility. Pretty and useful articles of pine, maple, walnut, oak, ash, and cherry were made from the great elm and sold at remunerative prices to the reverential tourists from all parts of the great republic. It is estimated by the careful statistician who compiled the facts for this work that not less than six cords of hickory walking-sticks, with the bark on, were made from the great elm and sold to Centennial pilgrims from the city. All the ground in the immediate vicinity of the Treaty Monument is now occupied by extensive lumber-yards, which appear to be stocking up with a great variety of seasoned hard wood.

The site of the "great elm" is not unmarked. Ah no! The people of Pennsylvania feel for that treaty and the site that it made immortal a profound and lasting reverence. In 1849 the legislature of Pennsylvania appropriated $5000 for the purchase of the treaty ground.

To-day, on Beach Street, Kensington, a three-cornered patch of ground, of the general shape of a piece of pie, and about the size of an army blanket, is notched out of the lumber-yards above mentioned. Two sides of this plat are shielded by a high, rough board fence, placed there to protect, not the monument, but the lumber-yard. The monument is of granite. It towers up to the height of a short man. It bears the inscription on one face, "Treaty ground of William Penn and the Indian nation. 1682. Unbroken faith." On another: "Pennsylvania, Founded 1682. By deeds of peace." It bears various other inscriptions. The youth of Kensington use it for a target when they have their brickbat practice. The reverential tourist has scribbled his obscure name all over it in fading pencil-marks. The more patient tramp has scratched his ubiquitous real or stage name on it with rusty nails. Some humble artist, on his way to paint the householder's window-shutters, has smeared a streak of green paint across the top of the graceful shaft. No stranger can find it alone, for the ways of modern Philadelphia are not of the original rectangular design, and the man who seeks to find the Treaty Monument alone is lost. The citizens will not aid him. To their undying honor be it recorded, they try to lose him, so that he may never find it. But before another year rolls round, as other years are in the habit of doing, a nobler shaft will mark this historic spot.

After the treaty, Penn went for a few days to his country-house in "Pennsbury," on the Delaware, opposite Burlington. It was a very comfortable hovel for a man of quiet tastes, and cost, with the grounds, between seven and ten thousand pounds, for the Governor was not the man to throw away a lot of money on a fine house. "Any sort of hut," he said, "is good enough for me." It was built on an island, "a treble island," says one biographer, "the Delaware running around it three times." When a river gets around the same place three times, you may safely set that place down for an island, whether the book says so or not.*

About this time, also, the first child of English parents was born in Pennsylvania, and Penn gave the infant, whose name was John Key, a tract of land. There had been plenty of Dutch and Swede children born before this, but they didn't count. This act of marked partiality, if it was intended to discourage the birth of children of other nationalities, and throw the mantle of a high protective tariff about new English children, failed in its purpose. Dutch children continued to be born with great regularity and frequency, unstimulated by the hope of any farm, until at length they owned and farmed about three fifths of the state of Pennsylvania, and held the other two fifths on long lease. In 1755 this first native-born Philadelphian, "First-born' Key, laid the corner-stone of the Pennsylvania Hospital.

In March, 1683, the Governor met the Assembly and Provincial Council in Philadelphia. Having a great deal more important business to attend to, the Assembly, with the natural instinct of a legislative body, began to tinker with the Constitution and Charter. It was all well enough, but they wanted to change it, for no man ever yet went to the legislature who did not want to change all the laws any other men had made, before he attended to any pressing business. The Assembly wanted a new charter, and Penn did not stand in the way of their desires. A joint committee of the Provincial Council and the Assembly drew up the new charter, in which the Assembly gave to itself whatever power it wanted, and generously invested the Governor and Provincial Council with the rest. This was the beginning of the tinkering with Penn's Constitution, and it has been kept up until to-day there is not one of Penn's original sixty-one laws on the statute-books of the state he founded.

The Assembly of 1683, among other things, voted an impost on certain goods exported or imported, for the Governor's support, which Penn refused to accept. He was the first great Pennsylvania free-trader; * he would let them impost him no imposts, and for years, it is said, the tax-gatherer slowly starved to death in Pennsylvania.

After a harmonious session of three weeks—harmonious because the Assembly wanted everything and Penn wanted nothing—this body collected its per diem, exaggerated its mileage, and, charging by the longest way, went home by the shortest.

* And last.

Penn was a Governor without personal ambition. He saw, and without a regret, the legislature of his own creation deprive him of his rightful and reasonable political powers until he couldn't so much as appoint a janitor or a policeman. "I propose," he said, "to leave myself and my successors no power of doing mischief, that the will of one man may not hinder the good of a whole country." His very life was wrapped up in the city and colony he had founded, and when, during this same year, important matters called him back to England, he left his great loving heart in Pennsylvania—"And thou, Philadelphia," he writes on shipboard, "the virgin settlement of this province, named before thou wast born, what love, what care, what service, and what travail hath there been to bring thee forth and preserve thee from such as would abuse and defile thee! My soul prays to God for thee, that thou mayest stand in the day of trial, that thy children may be blessed of the Lord, and thy people saved by his power."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE GO-AS-YOU-PLEASE WALK.

IT was about time to buy more land, or rather to buy over again some that had already been bought and paid for. There is a deed dated June 23, 1683, by which, for the consideration of a certain amount of money and junk to them in hand paid, Tamanen and Metamequan parties of the first part, conveyed to William Penn, party of the second part, all their land between Neshaminy Creek and Pennypack, and another, dated July 14, in the same year, conveys to William Penn certain lands extending from the Chester to the Schuylkill River, and as far back as a man could walk in three days.

The true story of the measurement of this land is a little mixed, but it is certain beyond all doubt or debate or dispute that the red brothers got caught on a falling market, and were most dreadfully left on the deal. "Tradition" steps in to protect William Penn from any obloquy in the matter, and relates how the Governor himself, with several of his friends and a number of Indian chiefs, "began to walk out this land at the mouth of the Neshaminy, and walked up the Delaware," it being the custom, doubtless, for "a man" to go in a crowd when he was going to walk out all the land he could cover in 72 hours. Moreover, "it is said," by this same trustworthy Tradition, that "they walked leisurely,* after the Indian manner,† sitting down sometimes to smoke their pipes, to eat biscuit and cheese, and drink a bottle of wine." There is a general air of truthful simplicity about this traditionary narrative that at once challenges the belief of the most credulous. And "it is certain," Tradition resumes, "that they arrived at a spruce-tree near the mouth of Baker's Creek in a day and a half, the whole distance being less than 30 miles."

That certainly was not a very large walk for a day and a half, and the "leisurely" Indians in the crowd were, up to this point, quite well satisfied with their bargain. It may be, indeed, that on an occasion of this kind the Indians did walk in a "leisurely manner," and no doubt they felt the unconquerable and terrible longings of the destroying "biscuit-and-cheese" habit, to which they seem to have been addicted, at every mile. There was a great temptation in that walk to make the Indians "leisurely." When they reached the spruce-tree at Baker's Creek, William Penn said that would include about as much land as he wanted just then, so "they run the line from that point to Neshaminy, and the remainder was left to be walked out when it should be wanted for settlement."

* Which sounds extremely reasonable. Part of the time, it may be, they walked backward.

† It depends a great deal on what or whom the Indian is walking after how "leisurely" he walks.

So far tradition clears the skirts of William Penn of any attempt to overreach the red brothers. And tradition is strongly supported by the whole life and character of the Quaker, who lived from boyhood to old age like a man with a soul above deceit or trickery.

But on the 20th of September, 1733, we get out of the realm of tradition and come into the record. On this day the remainder of the line, as provided and described in that deed, was walked out, fifteen years after Penn had passed away from all this care and trouble and bickering, to the reward of the righteous man. It was another impressive scene, the completion of this old transaction, the measuring of the land deeded to the man now sleeping in the Friends' burying-ground in the far-away English meadows. The Indians were on hand again with the usual rations of biscuit and cheese, which should mark the numerous halts for lunch. They had their pipes and plenty of tobacco with them, indicating how pleasant and "leisurely" would be the stroll, "after the Indian manner." It doesn't appear, by the record, that there were any bottles of wine to drink, as in the good old days of Onas, but that was because the Indians were more civilized, and had become enlightened by contact with the white men.* The Governor of Pennsylvania was not there, but he sent a hand. He said he wasn't much of a pedestrian himself, but he sent three men that he would back for the Astley belt and all the gate-money against any human being that ever ambled over the tan-bark. When these three men—Edward

* That is, they hadd learned to carry each mann his private flaske in his breaste pocquet.

Marshall, James Yeates, and Solomon Jennings —put on spiked shoes, and began to remove the greater portion of their garments, one of the Indians begged to remind the honorable gentlemen that they were going to take a walk, not a bath.

"Did you think of accompanying this overland surveying expedition?" asked Edward Marshall, in behalf of the Pennsylvania commissioners.

To which the Indian chieftain proudly replied that he contemplated keeping up with the procession, if he broke a trace.

"Then," said Edward Marshall, tightening his belt and gripping a corn-cob in each hand, "throw away your blanket and climb on your pony, and if I happen to fall asleep this side of the Ohio River, just wake me up and tell me of it, will you?"

The walk began at a chestnut-tree below Wrightstown. The men tramped gayly away, until they reached where Solomon Jennings said he felt aweary and lay down in the cool shade to rest. He rested well enough; but when he tried to get up, to his amazement there wasn't a solitary joint in his body, from his neck to his heels. So he was off the tan-bark, and got more rheumatism than glory for his walk. James Yeates kept along with a persevering gait until they reached the foot of Blue Mountain, when he was taken sick while crossing a stream, and Edward Marshall had to help him back.

"Now," said Edward, "I believe I will finish this walk and take first money myself."

And then that man set out to walk. And he did walk. "There is no funny business about this match," he said, and his panting red brothers began to believe it. Three white men started in for the walk, but after the first four laps it was evident that Edward Marshall possessed not only speed but staying powers, and he was the favorite with everybody except the Indians. When the "leisurely" savages suggested that it was about time to drink a bottle of wine, he said his trainer wouldn't let him touch it. But he intimated that he would drink a cup of beef-tea as he walked, if they would bring it him.

When the time came at which William Penn would have halted to eat the "biscuit and cheese" which cheers but does not inebriate or excite any great enthusiasm for walking, Edward Marshall said he had breakfasted on some lean mutton-chops, strong green tea, and calves'-foot jelly, and felt as though he could walk four hundred miles without a lunch. And when the Indians suggested pipes, the pedestrians all declared they wouldn't walk another step if any smoking was allowed in the garden.

So on they went, and Edward Marshall piled up the miles and tossed the broad acres over his shoulders like a man who is walking for first money. When he felt a little tired and the Indians urged him to take a little rest, expressing great concern lest he should break down and be unable to come in with the crowd at the finish, he merely fell into a regular heel-and-toe walk, and said that was the way he always walked when he went to sleep. Then when he woke up he would lengthen his stride and set the milestones down behind him in a reckless way that kept the scorer busy and made the Indians feel that walking had degenerated from a pure, health-giving exercise into a trade of the gamblers, fit to rank with baseball and the agricultural horse-trot of the county fair. At the close of the day and a half, Edward Marshall passed the judges' stand at a seven-mile gate, and the scorer marked up 86 miles on the board.

And the maddest crowd of Indians you ever saw came up to look at the score. They denounced the whole scheme as a swindle, declared they wouldn't pay any side bets, and said it was no way to walk anyhow, and no one but a white man would be guilty of walking that distance in a day and a half.* They admitted that the man walked; he did not run, and he did not ride, he walked, fair and square, but he walked too fast and too far. Any one who has ever noted the patient endurance with which an Indian at Niagara Falls can sit still on the curbstone fourteen hours a day, will readily understand the amazement and wrath of the "leisurely" Indians at Edward Marshall's extravagant restlessness.

The Governor pacified the Indians of 1733 by presents of rum and molasses and pie and other

* They were only silenced when, on demanding that the ground should be walked over again, the Governor showed them Rowell's record of 150 miles in 24 hours at Madison Square Garden, New York, and said the next walking for ground he did, Rowell was to walk for him.

intemperate beverages, but held on to the 86 miles of land all the same.* As for Edward Marshall, he said, when quite an old man, that he never got anything for this walk except a promise, a coin largely issued and circulated by Governors.

But the first half of this walk, where Penn strolled over the ground with the tranquil haste of a boy sent on an errand in a hurry, was free from heart-burnings. It is related, indeed, that Tamanen gave a dinner on the occasion, at which he feasted Penn on apple-dumplings, which was the only attempt ever made on Penn's life by the Indians. The Governor was a strong man, however, and the would-be assassin failed in his dastardly purpose. Penn suffered from a terrible nightmare that night. He dreamed that he was on his way back to England, sailing across the Atlantic in his hat, with a party of friends, when they were attacked by a pirate hat, a three-decker of vast dimensions, which sunk his hat and all on board. And while he was trying to remember whether his hat was insured, he woke in an agony of fear that it was, and it would therefore cost his widow five times the amount of the insurance to collect half of it. But beyond this one fearful night, he suffered no evil from the boiled dumplings, and affirmed off from the habit the next day, fearing it might grow upon him.*

During this year the colony made rapid strides toward an old and cultured civilization. Charles Pickering was indicted by the grand jury for coining "Spanish bitts and Boston money." The trouble with Pickering's money was that it was too big for its size,† and contained more copper than silver. Pickering was sentenced to redeem, at face value, all his light money, which was immediately called in by proclamation, and pay a fine of £40 toward the building of the new court-house, to be committed to jail until it was paid, and give bonds for his good behavior.‡

* It is said the Indians taught the white men to eat boiled apple-dumplings, in revenge for the introduction of rum and croquet into this country by the pale-faces.

† This was the original 92-cent dollar, afterward very popular among the more barbarous tribes of the United States.

‡ Some of Pickering's descendants are still living in Philadelphia, but they are not given to boring company with anecdotes about "When grandpa went to see William Penn."

There the Provincial Council sat in its first trial for witchcraft. In those good old times a colony without a witch would have been a rare novelty. The best families in Boston kept their own private witches, the best scholarship of Massachusetts accepted them; Cotton Mather hunted more witches than he preached sermons, and after a woman reached the age of seventy and lost her teeth, her life was safer among the pirates of Penzance than it was in Salem. Not alone the Puritans, who at this time made a belief in witchcraft a part of their religion, but learned divines of other denominations, on both sides of the Atlantic, not only believed in witches, but published pamphlets declaring their belief, that we of to-day might know that our good old fathers were no better than they ought to be, and didn't know a line more than the law allowed them. Richard Baxter in England believed just as Cotton Mather did in Massachusetts; and George Fox, the first Quaker and founder of the Society of Friends, not only believed in witches, but believed that he had the power to subdue them. Those were glorious old times, the good old times of our ancestors, when they boiled men alive in Germany and England for making counterfeit money; and they boiled them slowly, by a refinement of cruelty (letting the man down into the seething caldron feet first, so that he might enjoy it himself and feel good, when his feet got warm.) When in Scotland they burned an old woman and her child at the stake for creating a storm of thunder and lightning simply by pulling off their stockings.* When in our own favored land the zealous colonists jabbed an awl through a man's ears if he was a Quaker, and hanged him if he didn't quit it. When they slit a man's tongue if he was a Presbyterian, and pulled it clear out by the roots if he was a Methodist. And they tried to drown him if he was a Baptist! It wasn't really safe for him to be anything, because, no matter what he was, somebody could prove that he was a heretic, and burn him alive and take his farm. These "good old times," when a steamboat was a mud-scow, with a mainsail as big as a circus-tent, and a bar every fifteen feet in the river.† When a man went to bed at dusk, and got up in the night to eat breakfast, and struggled with the kitchen fire an hour and a half with a piece of cold, sullen, fireless flint and a wet tinder-box.* When fashion compelled even a bow-legged man to wear tights and knee-breeches. And the poor wretch had to wander about through life and in society, looking like a pair of parentheses with clothes on. And every time a girl danced with such a man, she felt as though she was waltzing in brackets. When a young man, if he went up Sunday night to see his sweetheart, as the custom was in the good old times,† had to sit the whole long evening through, over on one side of the room, between the girl's father and mother, while the girl sat on the opposite side of the room, beside the parson, who tenderly held one of her hands in both his own, to amuse the young man, while he earnestly warned her against all earthly vanities in general, and that young man in particular.

In such good old times as these, Pennsylvania could not hope to get along without at least one case of witchcraft. But the Pennsylvania witch

* Now we start the kitchen fire and the kitchen roof in one time and two motions with a simple tilt of the kerosene-can.

† A custom that has since become entirely obsolete.

was a very tame affair.* She was a Swedish witch. Her name was Margaret Mattson. There was another witch, tried at the same time, but as this witch's name is handed down as the astonishing compilation of Yeshro Hendrickson, its sex is to be guessed at. Margaret was accused of having bewitched several cows some twenty years prior to the date of her trial. One witness was called to prove this, and he testified that somebody told him so. Then he stepped down, and a female being, groaning through this vale of tears with the awful name of Annaky Coolin, testified that Margaret was guilty of high treason, felony, contributory negligence, and blasphemy, because when Annaky's husband was boiling the heart of a calf that had died by witchcraft, the prisoner at the bar came along, and learning that they were "boiling of flesh, she said they had better they had boiled of the bones, with several other unseemly expressions."

Nevertheless, in the face of this damning evidence, which in Massachusetts would have hanged her in a minute, the Pennsylvania jury merely found her "guilty of the common fame of being a witch, but not guilty in manner and form as she stands indicted." The witch was not punished; she was merely placed under bonds to keep the peace, and turned loose to torment the kine of Knud Christoffffersssson and Niels Nieddderssenn by her dreadful arts. That was the first and (with the exception noted on p. 141) only witch in Pennsylvania.

It is to be regretted that Penn's charge to the jury in this case is not on record. It would be interesting to know just what he thought of witches at a time when so many leading minds believed in them. But no doubt he thought with his usual good sense, and was as much ahead of his times as some of his colleagues were behind them. William Penn was a shrewd observer and a man of broad experience in courts and prisons, and he doubtless knew that in a case of witchcraft the major part of the meanness, ignorance, and malice was represented by the prosecution. In those days men's passions were very strong. But then their morals were very weak, so they could mix them and make a very good average.

CHAPTER IX.

THE LAND OF CORN AND WINE.

THIS year, among other things the busy little Legislature did, they ordered that an anchor be the seal of Philadelphia. Absent members of the house were fined 12 pence sterling, which shows that the early Pennsylvanian didn't know how to get elected to the Legislature, draw his salary and stationery allowances, collect his mileage both ways, and gather in a goodly allowance for a committee clerk, and never go near the capital. A bill was introduced prescribing that "two cloaths" only be used for clothing, one for winter and one for summer, but it was lost, as was also the bill fining all young men who failed to marry at a specified age.

And this year also cometh "Indian Ben," saying that he is an African slave of genuine Indian parentage, and that he is the bounden slave of Friend Ewer, and he prays for his freedom. But he didn't get it all the same. His owner said, "What's Ewer's is mine, and what's mine is my own," and held on to his slave. It was five years later that the first protest against human slavery came from the lips and hearts of Quakers. And they were not English Quakers then.

The grand jury this year presented "that all trees that are offensive in this city may be cut down." It may have been necessary to have the trees destroyed, but still one cannot help wishing that the members of this grand jury had been first hanged on them.

The attention of the Council was also called to a very grave matter. John White* came before it with the information that the Marylanders had reënforced their fort at Christiana, and would not let him cut hay. Nay, furthermore, they pointed their guns at him and cast what hay he already had cut into the swiftly flowing river. Moreover, "Major English came into New Castle with forty armed men on horses, and told him that, as to the case of his hay, he might peaceably cut it, if he would only say to them, "Thou drunken doggred Inglish, let me cut hay." It doesn't appear whether he said it or not, but this shows what vast and tangled questions of diplomacy and statecraft our fathers wrestled with.

This year and those following it abound in old settlers' stories, of cold weather, unprecedented high water, big yields of corn, the comfort of the cave houses, abundance of game, and tame Indians. A boy was sent out by an improvident white family to beg corn of some industrious Indians. One of the Indians, seeing the boy had nothing to put the corn in, and knowing a great deal better than to lend a basket, or anything else, to a white man, took off the boy's trousers, tied the ends of the legs together, filled them with corn, and hanging the laden bifurcated garmenture about the boy's neck, sent him home.

Again, some most excellent Indians, meeting some white boys in the woods in the afternoon, fearing they might get lost, sent them home,* then came to the house late at night, unable to sleep for anxiety, to ask if the boys got home all right. They seemed very much disappointed on learning that they did and were then sound asleep in bed, and went away profoundly dejected, the elder of the Indians remarking to his comrades "that a scalp in the bush is worth six in the house."

* Knowing that was the very way to make any boy go farther into the woods.

Richard Townsend was very much annoyed by a deer which came to look at him while he was mowing. Richard did not mow very well, having a habit of plunging the point of the scythe into the ground and then falling forward over the heel thereof, abrading his shins and ruining his temper as he went over. The deer followed him round and round, until its scrutiny became so embarrassing that Friend Townsend hung his scythe in a tree and made a rush at the deer. The fleet-footed monarch of the glen made a bee-line for the mountains. Richard Townsend had no gun, but he gave chase, and taking off his boots ran the deer down and kicked it to death. One of Richard's neighbors "had a bull so gentle that he used to bring his corn on him instead of a horse." This may have been a very remarkable thing in those days, though we cannot see why a bull that would carry a horse to mill without protest shouldn't be perfectly willing to carry a sack of corn.

In those days when the Friends went to yearly meeting, it was the custom of some families to leave the children at home, and the Indians always came over to the house, washed the youngsters' faces, brushed their hair until they cried, just as vigorously as their own mothers could, and would have clawed their tender scalps, pulled their hats down to their necks, and with a final whack on the crowns, so that not even a cyclone could lift the hat,* sent them to school. Then they fed the baby, rocked it to sleep, swept and dusted the rooms, brushed the fender, and scoured the hearth with venetian red, pocketed a handful of buttons, some spoons, and a case-knife, slid the grindstone under their blankets, gathered up the axe, smelt around the pantry for rum, and went away into the pathless forest without waiting to receive the thanks of the grateful parents.

When John Chapman's daughter wanted

venison, she just went out into the woods, found a big fat buck, took the halter off her horse and slipped it over the buck's head, and led him home.

William Penn writes in a long letter to the Free Society of Traders that "the kings, queens, and great men of several Indian tribes visited him;" * he found the land to contain "divers sorts of earth, sand, yellow and black, and gravel, loamy and dusty, and in some places a fast fat earth," not to mention the kind he could fall down in on the cross-walks; and with the unfailing instinct of an old settler he says as to weather, "I have lived over the hottest and coldest that the oldest liver in the province can remember." † He also discovered that the "natural product of the country, ol vegetables, is trees, fruits, plants, flowers."

This information was received with great joy by the Royal Geographical Society, which had previously supposed that the vegetable products of Pennsylvania were limited exclusively to clams, planked shad, Philadelphia squab, waffles and catfish, crude petroleum, and the Standard Oil Company.) Peaches, Penn said, were in great quantities, and "made a pleasant drink," from which we infer that they didn't waste many peaches in pies or canning establishments. He also declares that he is going into the wine business with some of the native grapes, and "hopes the consequence will be as good wine as any European countries of the same latitude do yield." Never in his life had "he tasted such duck and veal." He found divers plants which were medicinal, and "all of great virtue, suddenly curing the patient." From these wild plants, of such superior virtue, is made the wonderful and infallible medicine the proprietors of which offered the publishers of this work $65,000 for the insertion of its name in this connection.*

He found the Indians numerous, "tall, straight, well built, and of singular proportions; they tread strong and clever, and mostly walk with a lofty chin." He did "see some as comely European-like faces among them of both sexes as on your side of the sea,"—a style of Indian that has forever passed away (Fenimore Cooper used them all up.)

* But the publishers refused. They said they were not publishing books for money, but simply for the diffusion of a higher knowledge, the elevation of literary taste, and the gratuitous dissemination of a broader information on historical, speculative, and scientific problems.

"For their original," continues Penn, speaking of the Indians, "I am ready to believe them of the Jewish race, I mean of the stock of the ten tribes, and that for the following reasons: they were to go to a land not planted or known;" "their eye is little and black, not unlike a straight-looked Jew;" "their language is lofty and narrow, but like the Hebrew in signification, full;" "I find them of the like countenance, and their children of so lively resemblance that a man would think himself in Duke's Place or Berry Street, London, when he seeth them;" "they agree in rites; they reckon by moons; they offer their first-fruits;" "they have a kind of feast of tabernacles; they are said to lay their altar upon twelve stones; their mourning lasts a year."

He loved their language: "I know not a language in Europe that hath words of more sweetness or greatness, in accent or emphasis," to prove which he cites Octocockon, Shak, Poquesian, Passijon,* Secatareus, Runcocas, and Oricton. He praises their liberality, and mourns over their love of rum. At least one of their characteristics has been handed down to their children, and has developed and grown strong with age. For it is so that the forbidden fire-water which the honest trader selleth in these days to the children of the forest is even so craftily qualified that when a white man, even a blue-tempered cowboy from the ranges of the Arkansaw drinketh but one drink of it, he straightway turneth about and looketh for a clean place where he may have a fit.†

The Swedes, who were in the province before Penn's arrival, taught the Indians to drink not only rum but raw whisky, alcohol, highwines, camphene, aqua fortis, burning fluid, non-explosive kerosene, and other mild northern exhilarators.

Penn was proud because his two general assemblies passed seventy bills in two weeks, though but sixty-one of them went on record as laws, as though he foresaw that their successors would take seventy weeks to pass two laws, and both of them private bills embodying land-grants or railroad franchises. He says there was room in the Schuylkill—which in his plain way he spells Sculkil—to "lay up the royal navy of England." It is still large enough to lay up occasionally the American ice-man, who is a much larger man than the royal navy of Great Britain, and it costs a great deal more to keep him up. The Schuylkill, Penn said, "was a hundred miles boatable above the falls," but he wisely refrained from saying what kind of boats. There were fourscore houses in Philadelphia, and no end of caves, wherein the people were behaving themselves about as well as could be expected of people who live in caves, which was very well.* The saw-mill and the timber for the glass-house were placed by the river side, for convenience of shipments, without any regard for the interests of the Pennsylvania Railroad; "the tannery hath plenty of bark." † Two whale-ships were fitted out, and a company was going to lay a pipe-line to Nantucket, and charge tankage for every whale struck outside of Pennsylvania waters; Penn urged the Society of Traders to promote "whatever tends to the promotion of wine and the manufacture of linen in these parts," even while he mourned over the growing fondness of the intemperate savage for rum. (Penn was a teetotaler, but he wasn't bigoted.)

The Friends by this time had a few meeting-houses in the country. There were three in Pennsylvania, one at Falls, one at Pennsbury, the Governor's house, and one at Colchester, "all in the county of Bucks;" one at Philadelphia, one at Tawcony, one at Ridley, at J. Simcock's, and one at Wm. Rure's, at Chichester; the Dutch had a meeting-house at New Castle, and the Swedes had three—at Christina, at Tenecum, and at Wicoco—within half a mile of Philadelphia.

This summer went Colonel Markham to England on business for Penn. Lord Baltimore and the proprietor of Pennsylvania were still wrangling over the boundary question. (Each man owned more land than he could walk over if he tramped all the rest of his life, but he wanted more.) In fact, a provincial proprietor never did know when he had enough. He knew that he never had so much that he couldn't hold a little more, if he could lay his hands upon it. This Maryland boundary question was the first, and for a time the only serious annoyance that troubled Penn in the "Holy Experiment." Colonel Markham, as his agent, had held interview after interview with Lord Baltimore and his agents, without reaching any satisfactory conclusion. Penn met Lord Baltimore, in all formal state and decorous cordiality, at Colonel Failler's mansion in Anne Arundel County, and once again in New Castle, to discuss this boundary. But nothing came of it. The complete and appalling ignorance of the English people in regard to the geography of America at that time was even greater than it is to-day.* This was partly owing to the fact that in those days very few people came from England to America, unless they were driven to it by persecution and threats of death, and when a British traveller did come over for the purpose of making observations and gathering materials for a book, he probably bought a through ticket in Boston for San Francisco, crept into a Pullman car, and slept for six days and nights, woke up in San Francisco, went on to England by the Pacific steamers and the oriental overland route, and published a "History of the American colonies, with an account of the manners, customs, and national characteristics of the inhabitants; political organization, and religious peculiarities; with a complete glossary of the language; embellished with numerous illustrations and most accurate maps, and a portrait of General Assembly, commander-in-chief of the state of Philadelphia."*

Owing to this lamentable state of ignorance on the part of the Government, the boundaries of all the colonies, from North Carolina to Connecticut, were so inaccurately and loosely

* Even the most sceptical will admit that matters are not quite so bad to-day. Very few English maps now locate Erie, Pa., on the Canadian side of Lake Erie, and Illinois is usually set down as the capital of Nebraska. It used to be located and described as the capital of Faneuil Hall. Chicago, also, is now located as the sea-port town of Texas; whereas older English geographers used to say there was no such state as Chicago!!

described that the proprietor of any province could, with all color of right and law, claim as much of any other province as he wanted. Lord Baltimore's patent for Maryland named the fortieth degree of latitude for the northern boundary of his province. Penn's charter for his province also included "the beginning of the fortieth degree of latitude," and furthermore the charter settled the location of his fortieth degree of latitude by saying that it ran twelve miles north of New Castle. For eighteen years Lord Baltimore had been claiming all or a part of this disputed territory on the Delaware from the Dutch, but the Dutch, who had defeated the Swedes and taken it away from them, refused to give up a foot of it, and Lord Baltimore did not care to fight about it, as the Dutch had pretty much their own way on the ocean blue, until the English finally conquered the New Netherlands and took possession of the Dutch settlements and all the lands, industries, chattels, and effects.

Then when the King and the Duke of York granted these lands to William Penn, Lord Baltimore smote upon his chest and said he was a man of war, he would assert his rights, and he could whip any non-combatant Quaker that ever went out without his gun. Having none but Quakers to oppose him, and knowing they would not fight, he bristled up, made a formal demand for all the country in Pennsylvania and its annexed territories south of the fortieth degree of north latitude, and in the spring of 1684 sent a military column, under Colonel Talbot, to occupy several plantations in the lower counties, and immediately after his last conference with Penn wrote to the Marquis of Halifax and Secretary Blaythwarte, in London, an account of the meeting, very naturally and properly telling the true statement in the manner best calculated to count the most for Baltimore. "My motto in this boundary war," he wrote, "is the old war-cry of our fathers, 'Fifty-four forty or fight.'" * Lord Baltimore felt very easy over the boundary dispute now. "I am a little ashamed to fight a Quaker," he said, "it is so safe and so easy, but I'll have to throw him if he won't lie down."

* But then remembering that his fathers who raised that cry were not fathers until long after his son was a grandfather, he scratched out that sentence.

Alas for Lord Baltimore! Other men had felt just that way about it before him. But they never felt that way after William Penn let go of them.

CHAPTER X.

IN THE COURT OF THE KING.

PENN landed in England in October, and met a cheerful and exhilarating welcome. His wife was convalescent, but still poorly; the children had all been sick, but were now considered out of danger; his old friend Algernon Sidney had been beheaded, the persecutions of all non-conformists had begun again with new and harsher violence, the prisons were full of his brethren the Friends, as usual, and society and political circles were full of all sorts of malicious slanders and libellous stories and rumors about himself. Penn was deeply impressed. (He hummed a few strains of "Home, sweet home," before he remembered that song had not yet been written.)

He visited with his family a few days, and then went straight to court to see the King and the Duke of York and get in his best work in the boundary business. Lord Baltimore was there ahead of him, and while Penn was received very cordially, he "found things in general with another face than when he left them; sour and stern, and resolved to hold the reins of power with a stiffer hand than heretofore, especially over those that were observed to be state or church dissenters." No wonder the Quaker Governor thought that "to keep fair with a displeased and resolved government, that had weathered its point upon Penn's own party, "humbled and mortified them, and was daily improving all its advantages upon them, was a difficult task to perform."

The solution of the boundary question dragged along, with very little attention. Charles's health was failing rapidly and he did not take so much interest in the far-away colonies of the new world (as in another foreign country, an unknown realm, that was a great way farther off from him than Pennsylvania.) So the two Governors waited patiently for a change of kings, Penn engaging all his time and influence in succoring distressed Quakers, interceding for pardons, and getting people out of prison, so that others might be put in; for the prison cells were always kept warm, and usually with Quakers, so long as there were enough of them to go around. He settled the flying rumors derogatory to his own character as a man and a Friend. It was even reported that he was an iron-clad Quaker, armed to the teeth; that he built a fort at New Castle and mounted a lot of guns, in casemates and en barbette, with intent to do bodily harm to some belligerent Presbyterian or stray Baptist hunting for a sandy beach and waist-deep water. But Penn knocked all this terrible fort about his enemies' ears with a letter. He said there were some old cannon lying on the ground or swinging in broken carriages at New Castle when he went there, but there wasn't a round of shot nor an ounce of powder, "and had not been since he landed; and he could no more be charged with warlike propensities on their account than could a man who happened to buy a house with an old musket in it." ("Because," said this skilful pamphleteer, "I find a blonde hair in my butter, I do not shriek out that there is a woman in the churn.")

On the 6th of February Charles the Second, feeling that humanity rather expected something good of him, benefited mankind by dying. It was the last act of his life, and about the one solitary good deed he ever performed. After a reign in which unblushing vice and the immorality of the time were illustrated in the character of the King—a King who was nicknamed "Old Goat" by one who best knew him—a reign in which "the caresses of harlots and the jests of buffoons regulated the manners of a government which had just ability enough to deceive and just religion enough to persecute"—the King died in a fit, the result of his horrible excesses and vices.* Thus the world was happily quit of a "licentious debauchee, persecuting sceptic, and faithless ruler."

For such a good man, William Penn was decidedly unfortunate in his royal friends and acquaintances. He said in a letter to Thomas Lloyd, "He was an able man for a troubled and divided kingdom," probably the worst thing Penn ever said.

* It is very singular that he should have died, because Penn writes: "As he sat down to shave, his head twitched both ways or sides, and he gave a shriek and fell as dead, and so remained for some hours; they opportunely blooded and cupped him, and plied his head with red-hot frying-pans"! And yet the patient died. One would suppose such treatment would cure a paralytic in a minute.

During the reign of Charles more than fifteen thousand families had been ruined for opinion's sake, in the name of the Church; four thousand of these victims of persecution died in loathsome prisons. And, think of it! in five years this monarch "touched 23,601 of his subjects for the scrofula, or king's evil; the bishops of the Church of England invented a sort of heathen service for the occasion;" the "unchristianlike, superstitious ceremony was performed in public;" and Dr. Wiseman, an eminent physician of that time, writing of scrofula, says: "However, I must needs profess that his Majesty cureth more in one year than all the chirurgeons of London have done in an age."

Be it said to the credit of James,—so few things can be said to his credit,—that while he was Duke of York he had often protested against some of the vices and the persecutions which marred his brother's reign, if a reign without one redeeming quality can be said to be marred by any particular vice. And now that he was King, he was moved to be more indulgent. Penn waited upon him very promptly in behalf of the imprisoned Quakers, and James, avowing himself a Catholic, promised to do what he could to secure toleration for dissenters. He told Penn he was going to be open and above-board. Penn expressed his approval of his frankness, and further hoped that "we should come in for a share." The King smiled, and said "he desired not that peaceable people should be disturbed for their religion." Not a great while after, by releasing persons confined in prison merely for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, 1,200 Quakers were set at liberty. James was inclined to be very indulgent. He had been a sufferer from persecution himself, and knew what it tasted like. It may barely be that his motives in opening the prison-doors were manly and honorable. But he was a Stuart, and it was more likely that some lurking meanness impelled him to acts of simple justice and common decency. But an honest man was such a rarity in those times* that people were disposed to magnify and celebrate the smallest acts of common humanity without questioning the motives that led to their commission.

James had been the friend and guardian of

* Except in the prisons.

William Penn, ever since the dying Admiral committed his Quaker son to the care and good offices of his royal patrons. The acquaintance and intimacy then begun ripened rapidly now, and the Quaker spent a great deal of his time at court. His enemies made the most, and the worst, of this favor with which he was received at the court of a Catholic monarch, who dropped on his knees before the Papal nuncio, went daily and publicly to mass at Whitehall, and permitted the Jesuits to build a college in London.

But there were still hundreds of poor Quakers kept in jail for non-payment of jailor's fees, it being (an ancient English idea that if a man had no money, and you kept him where he couldn't by any possibility get any, he would by and by pay you in full.) Penn felt that it was for their suffering sakes he was now placed near the throne. Then, too, while he pleaded with James for religious liberty and the release of the suffering Quakers, he could now and then prod his Majesty a little on that Maryland boundary business, and so open the prison-doors, and crowd Lord Baltimore down south of the fortieth degree of latitude. He moved his family to town that he might be always at the King's elbow, and every day found him at Whitehall. Be it said that he used his influence with the king for good, and was earnest in his efforts not alone for his own society of Friends, and his own personal interest, but for other Christian denominations suffering persecution. His influence upon James was undoubtedly of the best. But James's influence upon Penn was not likely to improve the Quaker's morals to any alarming extent.

As Penn was known to have considerable influence with the administration, large numbers of people who could not reach the King, but could crowd in on Penn, thronged his house in Kensington, and overwhelmed him with petitions and recommendations and applications and addresses and advice and all the usual diversity of documents that flow in upon a new government.

Among the first favors he asked of the King was a pardon for John Locke, whom Charles had meanly stripped of his honors and dignities and cast out of the University of Oxford, "of which he was the chiefest ornament." The exiled philosopher went to the Hague, where he busied himself with his great work on the "Human Understanding." James had been a consenting party to Locke's banishment, but, at Penn's intercession, he readily granted the pardon. Like George Fox, however, the philosopher refused to accept a pardon when he had committed no crime, and he remained steadfast to this view of his duty.

Penn seems to have been a general mediator for everybody at this time. He assisted Popple, Locke's personal and political friend, out of some serious troubles in France. Retired and exiled Whigs came or sent to him, and found a friend in him. He interceded for everybody in trouble, and sometimes got into startling scenes with his royal patron on this account. On one occasion, at the request of a prominent Whig, Penn asked for a pardon for Aaron Smith, a man to whom he had never spoken. At the mention of his name the King flew into a terrible rage; angrily declared that he would do no such thing; said that six fellows like Smith would put the three kingdoms in a flame; declared there were too many Smiths anyhow, and threatened to turn Penn out of the room. He was only temporarily silenced, and the next time he preferred his request, he found the King in a better humor and got the pardon he wanted.

Of course Penn's enemies—and a man of his force of character had plenty of them—made the most of this close intimacy between the Catholic monarch and the Quaker, and the report was rapidly circulated that Penn himself was a Papist, a Catholic of Catholics, a Jesuit, educated at St. Omer's, the great Jesuit seminary. Even Dr. Tillotson, afterward Archbishop of Canterbury, whom Penn esteemed as "first of his robe," was troubled and filled with doubts by these rumors. Day by day the stories grew, until it was said that Penn "had matriculated in the Jesuits' college, had taken holy orders at Rome, and now regularly officiated in the service of mass in the private chapel at Whitehall." (Many began to believe that he was the Pope in disguise and carried the Holy Inquisition around in his hat.) Such an opportunity to write a pamphlet was not to be thrown away. Penn printed a little one, "Fiction Found Out," but it was not very interesting. It had lost the old ring of the early days when his pamphlets were shod with fire and tempered in aqua fortis. The womanly influence of Guli was evident in his preaching and his pamphlets, and his enemies and friends fared better because of his gentle Quaker wife. But then, his pamphlets were not such interesting reading for the general public as they used to be when he drew blood or blisters every time he hit. He wrote a letter to Dr. Tillotson, which satisfied him, and their old friendship was renewed. The Doctor himself set to work to deny the stories of Penn's Jesuitism, but this only made matters worse, for people now said he was more of a Jesuit than ever, and they could prove it by Dr. Tillotson. The grade of public intelligence was at a very high ebb at that time. You had to put a man in prison, and in some instances cut off his head, before you could get him to understand what you meant.

All this time the boundary dispute, that brought Penn to England, dragged along like a Congressional investigation. James was naturally well disposed to Governor Penn, but all these disputes of boundaries and rights, the petty and annoying disagreements between the colonies and the Crown, the quarrels and collisions between the all-pervading royal tax-collector and the tax-hating colonist, were damaging the interests of all the proprietors in America, and the home Government sometimes half wished America had never been discovered.

When Penn presented his formal petition, a council was at once called to take the subject into final consideration, and the King himself was present at the meeting of the board. It appeared that a considerable portion of the peninsula between the Chesapeake and the Delaware was included in both charters, and both proprietors wanted all of it. After the claims were gone into with great minuteness, James settled the dispute very promptly. He divided the debatable ground in two equal parts; the eastern half he gave to Lord Baltimore, as his right, and the western half he kept himself, to keep it out of future litigation. As there were only two halves, William Penn was left, and as he went home after that council he kept repeating to himself as he went along, "What do I see in this for Jones?" * James always intimated that he was going to give his half of the peninsula to Penn, some time when

Lord Baltimore had forgotten all about it, but then he always acted as though he was going to keep it himself also,—which he did, so long as he kept his kingdom. For all the new land on the peninsula he got, William Penn might as well have remained in Pennsylvania, and indeed it would have been money in his pocket if he had. He didn't find much of anything but trouble in England. As for this Maryland and Pennsylvania boundary, it was a baleful seed of trouble and troubles to come, for not until 1762 was it finally settled, and then it was surveyed by two engineers sent for that purpose from England, Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, and became the famous Mason-and-Dixon's line that bred much grief for the states of the union that succeeded the colonies.

He received official information from his province that the Quakers had held several religious meetings with the Indians, and the Indians had listened with great patience to whatever was said, were deeply affected by the meetings, always seemed to be very glad when they were over, and the same Indians never came back to another one.

The citizens who still resided in caves were

this year disciplined, because these holes in the ground were sinks of iniquity, and for general depravity and freedom of conduct were prototypes of modern beer-dives. And the Council had therefore ordered these caves to be destroyed, as Philadelphia was by that time so prosperous that every man could live in a house, and have some front steps to scrub every Saturday morning and fall over every Saturday night. The Indians had been called together and informed that they could have rum, subject to the same pains and penalties that were inflicted upon the white people when they tarried too long at the jug, a condition which the Indians joyfully accepted. All the early* history of the great republic, indeed, appears to be most intimately and inseparably connected with rum. This year several Indians came before the Council with grave complaints against the servants of Jasper Farman, who, the Indians averred, had made them drunk. A warrant was immediately issued for these unfaithful and bibulous servants, but the constable who undertook to serve it got lost in the woods, or himself succumbed to the potency of the rum on Farman's place, it isn't certain which, and the trial was postponed until the next day. At that time Jasper Farman's servants appeared and were ready for trial, but the prosecuting witnesses were not on hand, and a messenger being sent for them, they were found at home, filled with fire-water even unto the eyes, and so drunken they could not remember their own nor each other's names.

Penn, among other things, sent peremptory instructions to Thomas Lloyd, President of the Council, that the number of drinking-houses in Philadelphia should be reduced, without respect of persons; he deprecated the heavy charges to which people buying lands had been subjected, and denounced "three warrants for one purchase" as "an abominable thing." He was grieved and displeased with T. Holme for improper charges in his department; especially on the score of drinking-collations, a bill of twelve pounds, amounting to one quarter of the whole purchase of the land, having been sent in to a purchaser for expenses incurred in this way.* And the absent Governor mourned because animosities had begun to creep into the government, and made up his mind that he would come back to his province in the following autumn, unless something happened to prevent. And the very next mail which came wandering along some time that year brought him the reassuring news that Nicholas Moore, one of his most trusted officials, president of the Free Society of Traders, whom he had appointed one of the provincial judges, had been by the Assembly impeached, on ten counts, of divers high crimes and misdemeanors.

Penn's presence was more and more needed in his province every day, the boundary question was settled so far as he was concerned, all the prison-doors had been unhinged that he could open; dissensions, bickerings, jealousies were growing in his province, and still he lingered in England and went to court every day, although he hadn't a case on the docket and not a ghost of a show for being drawn on the jury.

The flames of civil war were kindled in England as soon as James was fairly seated on the throne, but the insurrection was almost instantly crushed. Monmouth and Grey were taken prisoners, and then began the rule of the infamous Jeffreys, the judge who had condemned Algernon Sidney to the block; the judge "after James's own heart," who "was not redeemed from his vices by one solitary virtue." England flowed with blood, and Jeffreys wreaked his own bloodthirsty malice and the vengeance of his royal master on hundreds of unfortunates who were unable to purchase pardons; for when James did not behead a rebel he robbed him, and after the robbery generally transported him so that he couldn't annoy him by complaining about it. Penn protested against all this cruelty and waste of life. He was ever outspoken and fearless in his denunciation of Jeffreys, even in the hour of that bloodthirsty judge's greatest power, openly speaking of him as "that butcher" and protesting against the "run of barbarous cruelty" due to "Jeffreys' cruel temper." His protests appear to have been useless, his connection with the court laid him open to suspicion and calumny, and it is at this very time the Macaulay charges are laid against him. James and Jeffreys,—it would be wonderful indeed if any man could stand near to those two and escape censure. William Penn was a good man, but when he was at court he had to mingle with a hard crowd.* Still in all his intercourse with James, and amidst all the venality, cruelty, and heartlessness of the court, Penn's character shines out of its base surroundings, a diamond in a setting of brass. There was never a time when the Quaker's voice and influence were not for mercy and religious toleration, and in spite of the malicious slanders of his enemies, the corruption of the court he frequented left no stain on his hands. Well was it for the persecuted non-conformists,—Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Quaker alike—that in such perilous times, in that long dark night of proscription and persecution, the dungeon, the fagot, and the block, they had one friend of influence at the Stuarts' elbow. It may be true that Penn's colony suffered while he was at court, but none the less did he suffer, and the loss of free Pennsylvania was the gain of English dissent.

* Poor Governor Penn! he had never seen the itemized expense account of a Congressional delegation at a funeral.

*He was very good. Even his best friends and apologists admit this. On one occasion while he was preaching, some of his enthusiastic admirers in the congregation made a rush at him, shouting, "Oh, kill him, kill him! He is too good to live!"

But James and his court were deaf to all promptings of humanity, and punished the defeated rebels with malignant cruelty. In transporting them, they sent the poor Whigs and dissenters to the High Tory and Catholic owners of unhealthful West India islands, where the exiles would find the climate and their rulers equally uncomfortable. Not more than twenty were permitted to go to Pennsylvania, or any other settlement tinctured with humanity. Cornish, an ex-sheriff of London, was gibbeted before his own house, as the accomplice of Sidney and Russell. Penn vainly begged for his life, and stood near him when he died, and after his death boldly vindicated his memory from the savage accusations made against him. Through his influence the mutilated limbs of Cornish, scattered about after his execution, were gathered up and restored to his friends. From the execution of the ex-sheriff, Penn went to Tyburn to see Elizabeth Gaunt burned at the stake for harboring a rebel in her house. Until the pitiless flames silenced her, she declared her innocence, and Penn, who had interceded with all his power for her life, could only stand near her to catch her protestations and carry them back to the King, there to quote them as arguments against other executions.

But for all these words and works of mercy the court and the creatures of James did not love Penn, and to punish him for what they deemed his interference with executions, banishments, and the general extortion of ransoms, the Crown lawyers, under direction of the minister, issued a *quo warranto against his province of Pennsylvania, and compelled him to vacate his charter. These proceedings, however, were summarily stopped by the King.

Meanwhile, the more James expressed his opposition to all penal laws against religious offences, the more the Church of England sustained and approved them. The repeal of the Test Act meant toleration for Catholics as well as dissenting Protestants, and it was apparent to the churchmen that James, caring nothing for the Baptist, Methodist, or Quaker, was only paving the way for the subversion of the established church and the reintroduction of Popery as the state religion, and then—the liberal, unfettered toleration which the Catholic Church, in countries where it was in power, granted all Protestant denominations would be enjoyed in England. The churchmen, seeing James surrounded by ultra-papists and Jesuits, were already looking to the Prince of Orange, and James, seeing this and knowing its significance, told William Penn that if he was going on a missionary tour through Holland by and by, he had a message he wished him to carry to the Hague.

CHAPTER XI.

THE WAY OF THE MACHINE.

"WHY CERT'NLY," said Penn, "and it is a most singular coincidence. I was just this minute thinking I would run over to Holland and rub up my Dutch a little. I understand a tribe of Pennsylvania-Dutch Indians have been discovered out near Doylestown in my province, and I want to be able to talk to them like a Kansas land-agent when I go back." And he cleared for Holland the next day, with a mixed cargo of religion and politics,—largely politics, with enough religion in the hold for a good moral ballast. As the informal envoy of James, he was to tell William of Orange that his good father-in-law was a liberal man and a Christian; that he opposed all religious tests and penal laws; he believed in perfect religious liberty and an unfettered public and private conscience, and he wanted to know what opinions the gentleman from the Hague held on these matters, and also what he would take to aid this liberal king to pass an act of toleration for all creeds and opinions, and obtain a repeal of the Test Act.

The gentleman from the Hague thought he rather understood his father-in-law. He had ge-married once into dot femilies already, und of he was his beesness geknowen, it was taken a bigger man than his fader-un-law und diesen archiquaecker to pullen de eyes over his wool. He intimated that if his father-in-law ever did a good thing, it was from a bad motive; he knew the family all through, his wife was a Stuart, and he could see clear through James's little game. As for himself, he declared "dot he was an Englander ge-born, und he vas opposet auf some foreign dominations on English affairs, und he would not haf some of it. Dot's beesness," said William of Orange firmly, like the bold Briton that he was, "und when I was over de Shannel ge-kommen you was wish you will leave me alone dot Test Axes."*

When he had discharged his cargo of politics,

* Penn corrected the inflexible Englishman, saying, "Test Act." "Oh," replied the other William, "is it only one? I dhought it was a dozens of it. Exes or hetchets, it makes me no difference."

William Penn turned his attention to the English exiles for conscience' sake, the native Quakers, and worked up a good emigration scheme for the province of Pennsylvania. Penn was a man literally and zealously "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." He had his account of Pennsylvania, a document built on the same ground-plan as a Nebraska B and M land circular of to-day, translated into Flemish and circulated among the farmers; he travelled through Holland and the Rhineland, and told the people that Pennsylvania was as big as a prairie, and that Germantown was next to Philadelphia and easily accessible by the street-cars and two lines of railroad.

When he returned to London, he sought the ear of the King, and found it,* and filled it with petitions for the pardon of exiled Presbyterians and other dissenters. When Penn entered into controversy with an opponent, he was pitiless. When he hit a Presbyterian preacher with a loaded pamphlet, that Presbyterian went right off into the woods and lay down and died. But when he found a Presbyterian or any other non-conformist in trouble, he had oil for his wounds, balm for his hurts, and money for his hotel-bill. Through his influence many exiles were brought back to their homes. Many of these men and their children remembered the Quaker most gratefully for his goodness of heart. Others repaid him in the usual coin of the world. They kicked him and told lies about him, and were only pleased with him when he got into trouble. Indiscriminate goodness is sometimes a mistake. There are some men whom, if you see them drowning, it is best to let drown, without interference. If you pulled them out of the river, they would sue you at law for laying violent hands upon them. This is especially true in politics.

Among others for whom he secured pardons was Sir Robert Steuart of Coltness. Penn met him in London after his return, and congratulated him in very difficult Latin, at which Sir Robert burst into tears, knowing he could not construe it, and fearing he would be flogged or kept in after school.

"Ah, Mr. Penn," he sighed, "the Earl of Arran has got my estate, and I fear my situation is now about to be worse than ever."

"What, man!" exclaimed Penn, "is thee going to lose thy job? Come to my house to-morrow, and I will set matters to rights for thee."

Penn went directly to Arran. "What is this, friend James," he said to him, "that I hear of thee? Thou hast taken possession of Coltness's estate. Thou knowest that it is not thine."

"That estate," says Arran, "I paid a great price for. I received no other reward for my expensive and troublesome embassy in France except this estate; and I am certainly much out of pocket by the bargain."

"All very well, friend James," said the Quaker, "but of this assure thyself, that if thou dost not give me this moment an order on thy chamberlain for two hundred pounds to Coltness to carry him down to his native country, and a hundred a year to subsist on till matters are adjusted, I will make it as many thousands out of thy way with the King."

Arran instantly complied, and Penn sent for Sir Robert and gave him the security. After the revolution Sir Robert, with the rest, had full restitution of his estate; and Arran was obliged to account for all the rents he had received, against which this payment only was allowed to be stated.

This authentic narrative from the Earl of Buchan's writings beautifully illustrates William Penn's fine sense of honor and justice when another man took an estate from one of his friends to reward himself for political services. Just why it never occurred to him to apply this principle to the estates of the Penn family in Ireland, acquired in a similar manner alike from the commonwealth and the monarchy, from Cromwell and Charles, for political intrigues and hard fighting on both sides,—is a question which lack of space forbids us to discuss. But perhaps he didn't have time. And then, Penn was an Englishman and his confiscated estates were in Ireland and naturally didn't count, at that time—nor at any other time.

All was not well at this time over in the province he loved, and his heaviest troubles lay in the city that was nearest his heart. The province was prosperous, and well able to support its Governor; certainly it could well afford to pay its honest obligations. But so long as Penn had plenty of money, he had supported himself and family, and maintained the provincial court at his own expense, and the freemen of the province were disposed to let him go on in the same way the remainder of his term. And at any rate, they were not going to pay any "quit-rents." The original terms on which Penn sold his lands in Pennsylvania were forty shillings in money and an annual quit-rent of one shilling for every hundred acres. Cheap enough, it would seem, but the thrifty Pennsylvanian protested against such an excessive tax as the quit-rent of one shilling a year for one hundred acres of land.

They wouldn't, or at least they didn't, pay William Penn a shilling, nor yet a penny, of his quit-rents. On this very subject, writing back to the province, the Governor sayeth: "that his quit-rents were then at least of the value of five hundred pounds a year, and then due, though he could not get a penny. God is my witness," said he, "I lie not. I am above six thousand pounds out of pocket more than ever I saw by the province; and you may throw in my pains, cares, and hazard of life, and leaving of my family and friends to serve them." "Besides," he writes again from London, "the country think not of my supply (and I resolve never to act the Governor, and keep another family and capacity on my private estate), if my table, cellar, and stable may be provided for, with a barge and yacht, or sloop, for the service of Governor and government, I may try to get hence; for, in the sight of God, I am six thousand pounds and more behindhand, more than ever I received or saw for land in that province. —There is nothing my soul breathes more for in this world, next my dear family's life, than that I may see poor Pennsylvania again—but I cannot force my way hence, and see nothing done on that side inviting."

It is estimated that by this time Penn had sold about one million acres of land, for which he had received £20,000, all of which, and £6,000 out of his own pocket, he had spent in and on the province, in presents for the Indians and payments for their land, and in other public matters, and now he could not collect his quit-rents from the colonists. This shows what kind of people were the early settlers of Pennsylvania. If Penn tells the truth, not one solitary beggar of them, Quaker or Gentile, Jew, Greek, or barbarian, paid up his quit-rent, for he declares he "could not get one penny." No wonder he could not see anything on this side "inviting." The early settlers of Pennsylvania did not believe in quit-rents. There was an air of feudalism about that sort of thing which they resented. They were the original land-leaguers, and they Boycotted their own Governor and benefactor, not for meanness, but on principle.

Worse than all this, his agents loaded sight drafts upon the poor man, and, as usual in such cases, timed them so they would reach him just when he was so short that if the whole State of Pennsylvania were offered at public vendue for a cent, he couldn't buy the village of Kittanning.

"Now," he writes to James Harrison. "I pray thee to draw upon me no more for one penny." Then he gets his back up and talks just as a Baptist would talk if he were a little mad. After complaining, and with justice, that the Council and Assembly omits all mention of his own name and the King's in its official acts, he says: "Next, I do desire thee to let no more mention be made of the supply, though 'tis a debt, since a plain contract in the face of authority for a supply. I will sell my shirt off my back,* before I will trouble them any more. I shall keep the power and privileges I have left to the pitch, and recover the rest as their misbehavior shall forfeit them back into my hands; for I see I am to let them know that 'tis yet in my power to make them need me as much as I do their supply: though the disappointment of me in that, with above £1,000 bills I paid since my return, have kept me from Pennsylvania above all other things, and yet may do. Nor will I ever come into that province with my family to spend my private estate, to fill up and discharge a public station, and so add more wrongs to my children. This is no anger, though I am grieved, but a cool and resolved thought."

It is just as well that William explained that he was not angry, for he talked as any man not a Quaker talks when he is, so to speak, a "leetle riled." And nobody could blame him for setting up his bristles a trifle, under the circumstances. At any rate, he put his foot down, changed the form of the executive department of his government, appointing five commissioners to act in his behalf, and instructed them to keep an eye on the Council and Assembly, to abrogate all that had been done in his absence at the very next session of the Assembly, and dismiss it immediately, then at once call it together again and re-enact such laws as they saw fit; look closely to the qualifications of members of both houses, and enact, disannul, or vary any laws, the Governor himself reserving his right of confirmation, and all his "peculiar royalties and advantages."

That is the kind of republican William Penn was when the Assembly of his own creation tried to leave him out. There was something of the old pamphlet fire still left in him, and he thought it was bad enough to be beat out of his quit-rents, without being crowded out of the government. And with all these perplexities and troubles on both sides of the Atlantic weighing upon him, Governor Penn felt how true was the remark of Friend Shakespeare, "Uneasy lies the head that has to manage a mixed colony of Quakers, Baptists (Deep-water and Hard-shell), Presbyterians (Old School, New School, Cumberland, United, and Blue), Methodists (P. E., M. E., North, and South), Ranters (Jumpers and Jerkers), Episcopalians, Puritans, Catholics, English, Irish, Dutch, Germans, Swedes, French, Norwegians, negroes, Welsh, and nineteen kinds of Indians." But still he did not lose his faith in Pennsylvania.

Once more we turn from the troubles of the distant province to merry England, where matters were reaching a crisis. James, supported by the opinions of his judges, on the 18th of March, 1687, issued the royal proclamation suspending all penal laws against religious offences, and forbidding the application of any test or the offer of any oath to persons who were appointed or elected to office under the government.

Had this declaration of indulgence come from any but a Stuart, the people of England might have received it with more unanimous grace. But the better James acted, the people argued, the worse he really was, and this was perhaps the correct estimate of this monarch. That he was sincere in his efforts to establish the religion of Rome in England, no one doubts; but as this was about the only piece of sincerity in his character, his declaration of indulgence was received with a great variety of emotions and sentiments. There were also grave elements of civil danger in the declaration, and the English people generally looked upon the act with distrust.

But all the same the poor dissenters who had been spending their valuable time in prisons and looking out upon the glad free sunshine between iron bars, thought the declaration that flung open their prison-doors was the very document needed to fill a long-felt want. And the poor creatures swarmed up to the throne with long, tiresome "addresses," by reading which they evidently hoped to kill the King, and thus be able to enjoy their freedom without the distressing encumbrance of being grateful to anybody for it. They thanked the King who had "heard the cries of his suffering subjects for conscience' sake," after the aforesaid sufferers had been howling in his ears nearly two years, and "since it pleased the King out of his great compassion to commiserate their afflicted condition," when the very dogs in the street pitied them and the dumb stones of their prisons cried out against their persecution, and since "he gives his dissenting subjects" that they may say their prayers without taking a book to church to read them from, and because "his most gracious Majesty the King had," for some inexplicable but undoubtedly selfish and wicked reason, performed an act of ordinary humanity and common decency, so unusual in his family,—then they were forever more his obliged, peaceable, loving, and faithful subjects, who had rather be kicked by a lord than shake hands with an honest carpenter, any day, and were going to show their eternal and supreme gratitude to their most gracious King just as soon as they could get a good whack at him, which would be when that gallant English prince, Wilhelm von Orange, arrived.

In the excess of their joy and gratitude, when they went up with their address, the Quakers even agreed to "waive the ceremony of the hat," and, headed by William Penn, the deputation entered the royal presence bareheaded.

Penn felt so good over this declaration, in the proclamation of which he is said to have had great influence, that he wrote a pamphlet, and called it "Good Advice to the Church of England, Roman Catholic, and Protestant Dissenter, In which it is Endeavored to be Made Appear that it is their Duty with a big D, principle with a large P, and Interest with a capital I, to Abolish the penal Laws and Tests." The title was originally much longer and covered both backs of the pamphlet, and people thought the good old times were come again. William Penn's pamphlets must have been a source of unfailing joy to the printer, for he wrote a free, easy, untrammelled hand, like the clambering woodbine as it corkscrews up an erratic water-elm. Something like Mr. Greeley's copper-plate text when he was in a hurry and didn't feel very well.

When Penn wasn't at court, he was preaching, and as he wasn't away from court much of the time now, he took advantage of his attendance on the King in his progress through Berk, Gloucester, Worcester, Shrop, Che, Stafford, Warwick, Oxford, and Hamp Shire, to hold a few meetings by the way, one of which, at Chester, the King attended.*

Penn now "viewed with alarm" the situation at Whitehall, where the Jesuits had a controlling and growing interest, and if he was influential in bringing about the Declaration of Indulgence, he began to see that he had invoked a spirit, so to speak, "as wouldn't curry nor skeer," and he didn't know what to do with it. In vain he approached the King with his boldest expostulations, and told him the nation was not only alarmed, but indignant. His influence was overborne by the Jesuit friends of James, who pressed him to obtain for Catholics a footing in the Universities. With this object in view, a pretext was easily found for prosecuting and dismissing Dr. Peachey from his office in Cambridge, and when the presidency of Magdalen College was vacant James named Anthony Farmer for election, and the Fellows promptly elected Dr. Hough. James censured the heads of colleges for disobedience, and ordered a new election, which the Fellows did not hold. Both parties continuing obstinate, Penn casually dropped in to the quarrel as mutual friend and arbitrator. The Quaker was convinced that the Fellows were in the right: they could not yield without an evident breach of their oaths. The King's mandates were a force on conscience, and contrary therefore to the King's own intentions. Thus he wrote to the King, (and the collegians themselves delivered the letter to his majesty, to save postage.)

His majesty was obstinate, and believed it impossible for churchmen to oppose the royal will. And, indeed, they would not when it coincided with their own. Oxford preached passive obedience when the axe and the Tower waited only for dissenting and commonwealth subjects. It was another thing when her own privileges were threatened. Penn still made efforts to reconcile the opposing forces. But while he felt the Fellows were right, and would not advise complete submission, he did insist that the King's self-love should be gratified a little; that his majesty did not like to be thwarted, and the dispute had gone on so long, they could not hope to be restored to the royal favor without making some concessions. Hough and the Fellows declared they had done all that was consistent with honesty and conscience, and besides they had a religion to defend. The Papists had already gotten Christchurch and University colleges. The present struggle was for Magdalen, and in a short time they threatened they would have the rest.

"That," says Penn, "they shall never have, assure yourselves. If once they proceed so far, they will quickly find themselves destitute of their present assistance. For my part, I have always declared my opinion that the preferments of the church should not be put into any other hands but such as they at present are in; but I hope you would not have the two Universities such invincible bulwarks for the Church of England that none but they must be capable of giving their children a learned education. I suppose two or three colleges will content the Papists. Christchurch is a noble structure; University is a pleasant place, and Magdalen College is a comely building."

The Fellows opposed Penn's more liberal ideas, and then the King most graciously relieved him from any further mediation by ejecting the Fellows from the college, and stripping them of their honors and preferments.

James, confident that Oxford and the church would loyally adhere to the doctrine of passive obedience taught by themselves, renewed the Declaration of Indulgence in April, and promised that Parliament should meet in November. He issued an order in council, directing that the Declaration should be read in all churches.

Half a dozen bishops disobeyed the royal order, in violation of their own tenet of passive obedience, and were committed to the Tower. When they came up for trial they were triumphantly acquitted, and the country applauded. That gallant English prince, William of Orange, came over with a large assortment of armed Dutchmen. James sat down to count his friends on his fingers, and finding he had about four thumbs more than were necessary for a full tally-sheet, stayed not upon the order of his emigrating, but got him hence and into France with great speed and utter disregard of the customs proprieties.

CHAPTER XII.

ANOTHER LIE NAILED!

THE historian and biographer of to-day, as in all times, find it much easier to locate the beam in their grandfather's eyes than to extract the mote from their own or their neighbor's optics, although the mote of to-day concerns the present world far more than does the beam of yesterday. We look with horror and indignation at the wickedness, cruelty, superstition, and general depravity of the courts of the Stuarts, when we write or read our histories, and forget, in the contemplation of bygone evils, the dishonesty of our own day, the scheming trickery that too often dishonors politics and degrades statecraft to the level of the pot-house caucus. We remember Jeffreys, and forget the vile assassin who slew our own President; with unutterable loathing we read how the bones of Cromwell were dragged from the sacred rest of the grave by the cavaliers whom he had winnowed like chaff while he lived, and forget the viler wretches who in our own day snarl in ghoulish hate about the grave of Garfield, and with shameless malice seek to blacken his character before the crape is taken from the doors of the Capitol.

So Macaulay, writing in his time, found it an easy matter to bring startling charges against William Penn. Penn was a good man, honest, conscientious, brave, and rather unfortunate in having for his friends such rascals as Charles and James. And yet, while his enemies have urged this against him, there were some reasons for this friendship, especially between Penn and James. When James, then Duke of York, was commander of the fleet, Penn's father was his bravest and best sailor, his trusted Admiral. Penn's father was intriguing for the restoration of Charles all the time he was drawing pay and begging estates from Cromwell, and he was the first man to welcome the graceless Stuart to his fleet. And for all this faithful service to them, the royal brothers loved Admiral Penn, and borrowed money of him as long as they could tap him. For his sake they loved his son, and when they owed him £16,000, they made him take his pay in wild lands in Pennsylvania, that Penn himself declares cost him more than he ever got out of them. The brothers loved him, and swindled him, and if any one can see wherein Penn was under any obligations to James, or why he should be a bosom friend of that monarch, his keen insight into human motives should be a great comfort to him.

Macaulay himself, like the pugilist who shakes hands with his antagonist before he breaks his head, says:

"To speak the whole truth concerning Penn is a task which requires some courage; for he is rather a mythical than a historical person. Rival nations and hostile sects have agreed in canonizing him. England is proud of his name. A great commonwealth beyond the Atlantic regards him with a reverence similar to that which the Athenians felt for Theseus, and the Romans for Quirinus. The respectable society of which he was a member honors him as an apostle. By pious men of other persuasions he is generally regarded as a bright pattern of Christian virtue. Meanwhile, admirers of a very different sort have sounded his praises. The French philosophers of the eighteenth century pardoned what they regarded as his superstitious fancies in consideration of his contempt for priests, and of his cosmopolitan benevolence, impartially extended to all races and to all creeds. His name has thus become, throughout all civilized countries, a synonym for probity and philanthropy.

"Nor is this high reputation altogether unmerited. Penn was without doubt a man of eminent virtues. He had a strong sense of religious duty, and a fervent desire to promote the happiness of mankind. On one or two points of high importance he had notions more correct than were in his day common, even among men of enlarged minds; and as the proprietor and legislator of a province, which, being almost uninhabited when it came into his possession, afforded a clear field for moral experiments, he had the rare good fortune of being able to carry his theories into practice without any compromise, and yet without any shock to existing institutions. He will always be mentioned with honor as the founder of a colony who did not, in his dealings with a savage people, abuse the strength derived from civilization, and as a lawgiver who, in an age of persecution, made religious liberty the corner-stone of a polity. But his writings and his life furnish abundant proofs that he was not a man of strong sense. He had no skill in reading the characters of others. His confidence in persons less virtuous than himself led him into great errors and misfortunes. His enthusiasm for one great principle sometimes impelled him to violate other great principles which he ought to have held sacred. Nor was his integrity altogether proof against the temptations to which it was exposed in that splendid and polite but deeply corrupted society with which he now mingled. The whole court was in a ferment with intrigues of gallantry and intrigues of ambition. The traffic in honors, places, and pardons was incessant. It was natural that a man who was daily seen at the palace, and who was known to have free access to majesty, should be frequently importuned to use his influence for purposes which a rigid morality must condemn. The integrity of Penn had stood firm against obloquy and persecution. But now, attacked by royal smiles, by female blandishments, by the insinuating eloquence and delicate flattery of veteran diplomatists and courtiers, his resolution began to give way. Titles and phrases against which he had often borne his testimony dropped occasionally from his lips and pen. It would be well if he had been guilty of nothing worse than such compliances with the fashions of the world. Unhappily, it cannot be concealed that he bore a chief part in some transactions condemned not merely by the society to which he belonged, but by the general sense of all honest men. He afterward solemnly protested that his hands were pure from illicit gain, and that he never received any gratuity from those whom he had obliged, though he might easily, while his influence at court lasted, have made 120,000 pounds. To this assertion full credit is due. But bribes may be offered to vanity as well as cupidity, and it is impossible to deny that Penn was cajoled into bearing a part in some unjustifiable transactions of which others enjoyed the profits."

Thus we see how Penn was impaled on the quill of the great essayist because he forgot what he had so often scrawled in his copy-book at the grammar-school in Chigwell, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." He trained in a hard crowd, and people naturally wondered what a good man could be doing at the court of James. Still, it was very necessary for one honest man to be near the King, and in forming its judgment mankind must remember that one greater and better and wiser than William Penn had also eaten with publicans and sinners. Penn, however, while he seemed to mingle freely enough with the sinners, didn't waste much time on the publicans. Nothing under a King for Governor Penn.

In libelling a better man than himself, Macaulay formulates his charges in five counts:

I. That Penn's connection with the court of James caused his own Society of Friends to look on him coldly and treat him with obloquy.

II. That he accepted the royal mission to extort money from the girls of Taunton for the Maids of Honor.

III. That he allowed himself to be employed in the work of seducing Kiffin into compliance with the designs of the court.

IV. That he sought to secure William's assent to the edict of James, suspending the penal laws. And

V. That he endeavored to seduce the Fellows of Magdalen College from the path of right.

These charges have been satisfactorily met at every point, and refuted by Dixon and others, and still more ably and fully by Samuel M. Janney in his most excellent "Life of Penn," and Penn's character is made to shine only the more brightly by the vigorous polishing it received at the hands of Macaulay. On the first count, that "Penn's own sect regarded him with coldness," it is more than probable that some of them did. Even Clarkson thinks that many of the Friends thought he meddled too much in politics. But these were Friends who were out of prison. Whenever a zealous Quaker found himself on the wrong side of the lock, he immediately became convinced that William Penn at court was the right man in the right place, and that he was doing the cause of religious liberty more good by standing at the King's elbow and saying a good word for the imprisoned Quakers than he could accomplish in any other way. And as the majority of the Quakers were in prison, it is evident that Penn stood well in the esteem and affections of the greater part of his Society. That some of them may have censured him, and did not treat him kindly or justly, is very probable; that many of them did not pay their quit-rents is beyond all dispute, on Penn's own testimony; and that the Friends are just as good as other people, and some of them much better than some other people, is a well-known fact. If William Penn was at all times universally and faultlessly popular with all members of his own Society, it is the first and only case of the kind on record. There was a Judas even among the Twelve. So it was no very serious matter that some of the Friends did not believe Penn to be a bit of earthly perfection. There are no perfect men in this world. There never was but one, and people hated him and crucified him.

The affair of extorting money from the girls of Taunton was simply this. When Monmouth arrived at Taunton in his revolt against James, that town was enthusiastically rebellious, and the school-mistress led a procession of her pupils to meet him, and presented him a set of royal standards. Some of the little girls in the procession were not over ten years old. None the less they were rebels, and the sentence of death hung over them. It was one of the refined customs of the court of James to divide the rebels among the King's friends, for transportation or ransom, according as the friend wanted colonists for his plantations over the sea, or ready money. "The Queen begged one hundred for some favorite whose name is not preserved," "Sir Philip Howard received two hundred," "Sir Richard White two hundred, and two other knights received one hundred each." So the poor wretches were distributed around like merchandise, and the friend who received this gift of men, women, and children set ransoms on their heads, and wrung their freedom or money or life away from them.

While all the others were getting so much out of this traffic, the female persons of the court—called, by a ghastly sarcasm, Maids of Honor—proposed to hypothecate a few pardons themselves. The King gave them these Taunton school-girls, and the alleged maids of so-called honor began to manipulate their little corner. The maids had some trouble in getting the matter arranged, as all the men to whom was offered the mission of managing the sale of pardons in the case of these school-girls refused to be mixed up in the business, until a man named George Penne was found, a professional pardon-broker, who officiated in this robbery. William Penn, on the best evidence, had nothing to do with the shameful transaction.*

As for William Kiffin, he was a Baptist preacher, and an old opponent of Penn's. In his anxiety to do good that evil might come, James was doing all he could to secure the adhesion of dissenting subjects, and therefore appointed William Kiffin a city magistrate. But this most liberal and tolerant monarch had just beheaded two of Elder Kiffin's grandsons for expressing their views on religious liberty by joining Monmouth's army, and it was feared that the old man might not be anxious to accept office under the murderer of his boys. A grandfather of any sensibility naturally would feel a little delicate about it. Kiffin came to Penn to ask him that he "might be excused," or else Penn went to Kiffin to advise him not to throw over a good thing when he had it, or Kiffin and Penn came to each other. Macaulay states positively, as he states everything he has occasion to say, that Penn was employed by the "heartless and venal sycophants of the court" to seduce Kiffin into the acceptance of an Alderman's gown. Kiffin himself, quoted by the defence, says: "A great temptation attended me, which was a commission from the King, to be one of the Aldermen of the city of London; which, as soon as I heard of it, I úsed all the diligence I could to be excused, both by some lords near the King, and also by Sir Nicholas Butler and William Penn, but all in vain; they said they knew I had an interest that would serve the King, and although they knew that my sufferings had been great, by the cutting off of my two grandsons and losing their estates, yet it should be made up to me, both as to their estates and also in what honor or advantage I could reasonably desire for myself." * If Elder Kiffin knows what he is talking about, it would appear to a man up a tree that William Penn did advise him to accept office under the King, who would pay the old man for his grandsons (at the ruling rate on 'Change, and on the usual terms for grandsons, thirty off for cash.) If any man can make anything else out of Kiffin's statement, which is the only evidence quoted by the defence, that man ought to rise up and tell the American people just what William's position was in this supremely important matter (of Elder Kiffin's aldermania.)

The story of Penn's connection with the Magdalen College affair has been gone over briefly in a foregoing chapter, and Samuel Janney's exhaustive researches have been sufficient to show that the great Quaker had clean hands and a right mind in all this matter, and said and did nothing derogatory to his character as a man of honor. In general, the Macaulay charges fall to the ground in the light of fair investigation, and the great essayist himself bears willing testimony to Penn's "eminent virtues," to his "strong sense of religious duty," to "his integrity that stood firm against obloquy and persecution;" as "a lawgiver who, in an age of persecution, made religious liberty the corner-stone of a polity." His charge that the Quaker's resolution gave way when attacked "by female blandishments" only excites a smile. That he "had no skill in reading the characters of others," and that "his confidence in persons less virtuous than himself led him into great errors and misfortunes," is sadly true, as Penn himself learned in some of the bitter experiences of his old age. That he "endeavored to gain William's assent to the edict of James, suspending the penal laws," is not proved. It is known that Penn, much as he approved of the widest principles of religious liberty embodied in that proclamation, rejoicing as he did to see the prison-doors opened by it, feared that the arbitrary suspension of the obnoxious enactments was the use of a dangerous prerogative, and was ever anxious to have the Declaration sanctioned by Parliament. William was positively and most certainly a good man, but he would dabble in politics. And no man ever yet went into politics, though he went in not more than knee-deep, who did not come out plastered with mud to the nape of his neck. The better he is, the more mud is fired at him.

CHAPTER XIII.

CRUSHED AGAIN!

WILLIAM PENN did not attend court so regularly now as he was used to do. Most of his friends at court had gone out of the country, and he was almost the only man who had been intimately associated with James who did not run away. He knew he had done nothing to run for. And even if he had, Penn was not the man to trust in his legs, and he feared the new King no more than he had feared the Tower and Newgate in the old days of persecution. He would not listen to his friends when they urged him to fly to America and look after his province. He did not even change his address. He remained in London and took his daily walks in Whitehall as usual.

One day in December he received a message informing him that the Lords were then sitting, and if he would favor them with his attendance, they would like to propound a few conundrums to him. When a man received a message of that nature, he did not send word that he would walk around the block and see them later. If he couldn't get over to France, he went right along with the messenger. Penn went before the Lords, and in reply to the numerous questions they propounded to him he said that he had ever loved his country and Chesapeake oysters, and had been devoted to the Protestant faith and the colony of Pennsylvania, and had always done his best to promote the true interests of all these things. The recent King, he added, had been his friend and his father's friend, and while he no longer owed him allegiance as a subject, owing to circumstances over which his recent majesty appeared to have very little control, yet as a man he still retained for him a great deal more respect than any member of that family ever deserved. He had done nothing, and should do nothing, but what he was willing to answer for before God and his country.

The Lords were puzzled what to do, but as it appeared, after a rigid investigation, that Penn had done nothing for which he could be held, they decided to hold him under bail of £6,000, and with this pleasant reminder of prosecution and more trouble, he was allowed to roam at large. His case was continued from term to term for about a year, and then when he appeared in court there were no prosecuting witnesses and he was discharged.

The first Parliament in the reign of William and Mary passed the Act of Toleration, which was hailed with great joy by all denominations save the Catholics, who were left out. It did not remove the tests, nor did it extend its privileges to people who did not believe in the Trinity. But none of the penal laws could now be construed against those dissenters who would take the oath of allegiance to the present government, and a special clause was inserted for the Quakers, allowing them to swear or affirm.* The act was not as broad in its liberality as Penn would have liked to see it, but it was better than nothing, and as he had no influence with this administration anyhow, he was glad to see his friends get what they could out of it. As it was, the act was altogether too merciful to please the gentle Church of England, and it therefore opposed it, but the King was too heavy for the Church, and the bill went through both houses by a large majority, and the law could no longer give a man thirty days or ten dollars because he wouldn't go to a church where he didn't know the facings and couldn't find the place, and always knelt down when the rest of the people stood up, and roared out "Good Lord deliver us!" at the prayer for the King—a response that was eminently appropriate but highly improper. The world was slowly coming to its senses.

In America, matters were still progressing miserably in his province. Once more Penn reformed the executive department of his government, and it was so reorganized as to consist of a Deputy Governor and two assistants.* President Lloyd said he had all the glory and twice the trouble he had ever hungered for in governing a new province, and he resigned. Penn appointed Captain John Blackwell, of Boston, in his place. Captain Blackwell was not a Quaker, but he was a "grave, sober, wise man," and had been a soldier of the commonwealth, and Penn believed in him. The proprietor's quit-rents continued to be very much due, and at this time he writes: "I have rough people to deal with about my quit-rents, that yet cannot pay a ten-pound bill, but draw, draw, draw, still upon me. And it being his talent (Blackwell's) to regulate and set things in method, easy and just, I have pitched upon him to advise therein." Blackwell came, saw, and got into a row the first thing. The Friends disliked him because he was a military man, and perhaps he stirred up the people about their quit-rents, which was always a tender subject with them. Dissensions still existed in the Assembly, and it was difficult for the Deputy Governor to get a quorum of the Council together. Of course, Council, Assembly, and Deputy Governor poured their complaints in upon Penn, who finally advised Blackwell to resign, "although," the Governor writes, "I must say that his peevishness to some Friends has not risen out of the dust without occasion." The government then reverted to the Council, with Thomas Lloyd president, the original form of 1683.

During this year, also, Clarkson says, Penn wrote to Lloyd, instructing him to set up a public grammar-school in Philadelphia, which he would incorporate, by charter, at some future time. This, says Janney, "gave rise to the Friends' Public School, which was incorporated in 1697, confirmed by a fresh patent in 1701, and by another charter in 1708, whereby the corporation was forever thereafter to consist of fifteen discreet and religious persons of the people called Quakers, by name of 'The Overseers of the Public School, founded in Philadelphia, at the request, cost, and charges of the people called Quakers.' But its last and present charter from William Penn, confirming the other charters and enlarging its privileges, is dated 29th of November, 1711, by which the election of the overseers is vested in the corporation. In this excellent institution, the poor were taught gratuitously, others paid a proportion of the expense incurred in their children's education, and it was open on the same terms to all religious persuasions."

In the year preceding the establishment of the public grammar-school, the first protest against human slavery in America had been bravely spoken. At a monthly meeting of the German Friends at Germantown, in April, 1688, the members of the Society present gave their testimony against the evil that was one day to overshadow the land with clouds of war and drench the republic with blood. This protest against slavery was signed by Garret Henderich, Derich Op de Graeff, Francis Daniel Pastorius, and Abram Op de Graeff.

In 1690, the first American paper-mill was established near Germantown, on the Wissahickon, by William Bradford and William Rittenhouse. At this mill the paper was made on which the Weekly Mercury was printed in New York.

But while his province was prospering in its material development, it needed the presence of the Governor, and Penn was anxious to return to it. The persecutions of the dissenters had ceased; he could do no more for his Society; he had remained in the country after the accession of William and Mary long enough to get arrested and dismissed, and had shown people that he had no fear and did not shrink from the consequences of any of his acts, and he wanted to come back to Pennsylvania and stir up the peasantry about those quit-rents. But there were several reasons for his remaining in England.

One day, just before King William went to Ireland for the purpose of fighting a battle,—the anniversary of which would forever be celebrated several days out of date, and would every year be the cause of as many broken heads as there may be Orangemen in New York,—a file of soldiers arrested Penn and took him before the Lords of Council, on a charge of holding treasonable correspondence with King James. Penn did not like the make-up of the Council, for among them, now the bitterest persecutors of the Catholic King, were the men who had fawned on him with most servile submission when he was on the throne. He demanded an examination before the King in person, and accordingly Friend William and King William faced each other, and the Quaker was informed that his clandestine correspondence with King James was known. He was glad to hear of this, because he did not know anything about it himself, and would like very much to hear what there was in it. They told him he had better save his sarcasm for the Indians, and then showed him a letter from James to himself which had been intercepted. It was a square deal, no doubt of that; the letter was genuine and addressed to Penn. Evidently somebody had access to his lock-box, and Penn said there would be a vacancy in the London Post Office if he had any influence with Frank Hatton. In this letter, the exiled King desired Penn "to come to his assistance and express to him the resentments* of his favor and benevolence."

They asked Penn why James Stuart wrote to him. Penn couldn't say. The Stuarts usually wrote to his family for money, and he had no doubt that was really what James wanted now. He couldn't get it, if that was it. Penn had no money to spare, in the first place, and if he should send his friend a draft, some of the rascally carriers under this administration would steal it. Penn made this last remark in a loud, defiant voice.† Then the Council wanted to know what "resentments" did he mean. Under what obligations of gratitude was Penn to James? This must have puzzled Penn when he thought it over. What did he owe to the Stuarts? He and his father before him had served them faithfully and zealously, and Charles and James had used them so long as they were useful, and had paid their debts in acres of wild land and tribes of wilder Indians. Finally he answered that he supposed James wanted him to assist in bringing about his restoration, and while Penn still protested his friendship for the exile, and declared that as a private person he was willing to render him any service in his power, yet as a citizen of England he owed him no obedience, and had never thought of aiding him to regain the throne.

At the conclusion of this examination, Penn was bound over to appear in court at the Trinity term, and when he appeared he was again discharged. William the Quaker was a far better man than was William the Admiral under a similar state of things, and James thought very meanly of Penn when he believed him capable of plotting treason against the Government. What had this narrow-minded man ever seen in Penn to justify him in such a base estimate of his character?*

James landed in Ireland, and King William went to meet him in that famous foot-race known as the Battle of the Boyne, in which contest of speed James came out a little ahead, although William was close behind him. In London Penn was again in danger of arrest. Lord Preston, Master Ashton, and a man named Elliott had been arrested on the eve of their departure for France, and papers of a treasonable nature were found on their persons, which implicated a number of people of note. A proclamation was issued for the arrest of the Bishop of Ely, Lord Clarendon, and William Penn, among others. Penn was not then arrested, although he wrote to the Secretary of State, asking when he would be wanted and expressing his readiness to come in at any time. Going to prison every few days seemed like old times for him, and it is a mystery how he kept himself from writing a few pamphlets. There was no evidence against him in this case, nothing in the intercepted papers to implicate him, but so long as he was in the country it seemed to be the opinion of Mary, who was running the mangle during her husband's absence, that he might as well be in prison. So he went to his dungeon-cell,* and on the last day of Michaelmas term—whenever that is or was—he was brought into court, acquitted, and discharged as usual.

On the 13th of January George Fox died, and William Penn stood beside him as he "finished his glorious testimony." "He is gone," said Penn, "and has left us in the storm that is over our heads, surely in great mercy to him, but as an evidence to us of sorrow to come." Penn officiated at the funeral, and even in the depth of his sorrow his own troubles pursued him. No grief was sacred and no grave secure in the good old days.

A body of officers hurried to the grave of George Fox to arrest Penn on a new charge, but they reached the spot too late; the Quaker had returned to his home. Here he learned that William Fuller, a gentleman who supported himself in easy affluence by swearing to anything he could be paid for, had, under oath, accused him of being engaged in treasonable correspondence with the enemies of the Government. This same detective, also swore out another accusation against him in Dublin, being determined to earn his money and maintain his character as a detective, if he had to accuse

Penn all over Europe. It is some consolation to know that within a few months the House of Commons took up this man Fuller and resolved that he was "a notorious cheat, rogue, and false accuser, who had scandalized the Government and magistrates and abused the House." And within ten years he was convicted as a libeller, condemned to stand three times in the pillory, fined 1,000 marks, and sent to prison.

In the face of these accusations and warrants, Penn once more postponed his return to Pennsylvania, and for a few months lived very quietly. He had no idea of going into court to stand the farce of a trial with professional perjurers as witnesses for the prosecution, and the fact that he made no effort to purchase Fuller indicates that detectives were more expensive then than now, or else the Government could outbid him on witnesses. If Penn could only have collected his quit-rents, he might have bought all the witnesses he needed. As it was, he simply kept himself in a general state of umbrageous seclusion, and was not at home to any gentleman wearing a star on his coat. But it is probable that he would have been found had the Government wanted him very much or really believed him to be guilty. He wrote letters from his retirement—nothing could keep him from writing letters. He pledged himself to the King for "inoffensive behavior" of himself, and spelled behavior with a "u" to make it more binding; and begging for either peace or fair treatment, he added, "If I am not worth looking after, let me be quiet; and if I am of any importance, I am worth obliging." "Let me go to America, or let me be protected here."

Penn was more than ever anxious to return to America, and he must have half wished he had never exchanged Philadelphia for London. The officers of the law were after him with two warrants, his enemies were reiterating the old charges of Jesuitism, everything King James had done that was unpopular—and all his acts were unpopular since the new King came in—was charged upon William Penn; even many of the dissenters joined in the clamor against him, members of his own Society treated him coldly, and the day of his influence at court had passed away. But yesterday, and at Penn's house in Kensington, crowds of clients, friends, and suitors waited on him, begging for his favor with the King; petitions, remonstrances, and addresses were entrusted to the courtly Quaker's influence and keeping, with most obsequious reverence and courtesy; no man so favored and so courted, and to-day, hiding in a back room up a rickety flight of stairs, with a camp bedstead, a tin wash-basin, and two hooks in the wall for furniture, and one window with a view of a back alley and a Chinese laundry. How vain are the smiles of princes, and how lighter than vanity it is to put one's trust in kings.* How often, in his retirement, must poor Penn have thought of the impressive remarks of Rev. Alonzo C. Wolsey, the well-known revivalist:

". . . Oh, Cromwell, John H. Cromwell!
Had I but attended to my own knitting,
And worked as hard for my own province,
With half the zeal and about one third of the money,
As I have served this go-as-you-please-so-you-get-out-of-the-country King,
I had not then been left by any man."

In these days of trial and affliction came one grateful friend, Locke, and offered to procure a pardon for him, for it was now Locke's day of grace. But as Locke had conscientiously refused a pardon, obtained for him by Penn, because he knew he had done no wrong, as George Fox had refused pardons because only guilty men could be pardoned, so now William Penn would have none. He asked for justice, not mercy, and he refused to go to America as an exile.

* Three tiny little deuces will take the rigidity out of the two biggest Kings that ever glared upon the glittering boards.

Affairs were growing more and more complicated in Pennsylvania. The inhabitants of the territory showed a desire to secede from the province, and the members of Council from the territories insisted on separate civil establishments, and, ignoring the honorable members from the province, proceeded to appoint their own judges, and issued their commissions. Penn, willing to conciliate the territories, wrote to the Council, submitting for the people's choice three forms of executive, a Council, or five Commissioners, or a Deputy Governor. The people of the province promptly decided on a Deputy Governor, and the territories, being in a large minority, could not help themselves, although they wanted the five Commissioners, and wanted the Deputy Governor least and last of any. But the province, for the sake of peace, made them a fair offer: "I'll take the turkey and give you the buzzard, or you take the buzzard and give me the turkey." And so the province took the Deputy Governor, and named Thomas Lloyd for the place, while the three lower counties would none of him, and scoffed at him and would not make obeisance before him, but said "Ha, ha," and called him "Tom" and "Gov."

Penn was displeased with Lloyd for accepting "a broken office," and he justly blamed the territory men for their ingratitude. But scolding wouldn't help matters, so he did the best he could. He confirmed Thomas Lloyd as Deputy Governor for the province, and sent out Colonel Markham as Deputy Governor for the territories. This firm action on the part of Penn was immediately felt. The two sections had now each its own deputy governor to support, and fearing that Penn might send out a Lieutenant-Governor and possibly a Governor-at-Large, they subsided into tranquil and trembling submission. Their pacification and suppression was complete when there came a rumor from England, that if there was any more trouble, Penn had threatened to send out a real governor's private secretary, appointed from the ranks of our best young men. This dreadful threat, coming from one usually so kind and merciful, cast a gloom over the entire community. Penn was sorely distressed about the near future of his province, for he saw whither it was drifting.* "Lay their union upon them," he wrote, "for else the Governor of New York is like to have all, if he have it not already."

George Keith, feeling that nobody would know who he was nor what he was doing if he didn't talk loud and call upon the editor every time he came to town, now added his little firebrand to the general distraction. It was not well, he thought, to have all the unrest and excitement and hullaballoo confined to politics. The mixture needed a little tincture of religion to make it bitter. George was a Scotch Quaker, a minister of the Society, a fine scholar, with a profound respect for George Keith and the "docthrines" with a long o. He had been a stanch and able Quaker, but he would rather wrangle over some rugged tough old theological knot than eat. He now started to reform the Society. Some of its doctrines he ridiculed, some he denounced; he abused the Friends for taking any part in politics or assisting in the execution of the laws, set up a separate meeting, drew large numbers of Friends after him, went to England and was ordained a clergyman of the Church of England by the Bishop of London, and returned to the province in orders, a clergyman of the most political church then known. His Quaker followers looked at him in amazement. They had tasted the Christian love and fellowship of that church in nearly all the prisons in England, and had quivered under the pitiless lash of its persecution until a dreadful Catholic prince stayed its arm, and they didn't care for any more Episcopalian on their dish. No wonder that many of Keith's followers left him, and the wonder is that any should remain with a man who placed himself in the exceedingly pleasant position of denouncing, for one half his life, what he had spent the other half in defending.

All this religious and civil distraction and dissension in the province gave the King the pretext he needed, and Penn's worst fears were realized. During the war with France, it was necessary that the King should have a firm and controlling hold upon all the colonies. Many charters were annulled on various pretexts, and on the 10th of March an order in council was promulgated, which deprived William Penn of his government, and placed the province of Pennsylvania under the jurisdiction of Benjamin Fletcher, Governor of New York.

Penn's downfall must have moved even the pity of his enemies. He claimed that he was almost impoverished by his expenditures for his model province; his Irish estates had been wrung from him in very much the same way they had been wrung from some one else for his father; swindled by his own stewards, over head and ears in debt, neglected or persecuted where he had been courted, under the suspicion and frowns of royalty where he had basked in the smiles of the court, deprived of his governorship, and forced to see the fate of the "Holy Experiment" in the hands of a rough soldier, arrest hanging over him and the prison yawning before him, his loving wife heart-broken over her husband's troubles and reverses, care and sorrow hemmed him in on every side. But he was patient and content to abide the just judgments of time. "I know my enemies," he writes, "and their true characters and history, and their intrinsic value to this or other governments. I commit them to time, with my own conduct and afflictions."

It is a world of change. The radiant sunrise and the cloudless skies this morning; the tossing clouds and the pitiless storms to-night. To-day, we stand in voiceless admiration before the glowing bill-boards of Barnum the magnificent; to-morrow, the circus is gone and the all-devouring goat of the upper wards browses pensively upon the gorgeous tropical scenery, the writhing boa, the fierce Numidian lion, the Kentucky giant, and the fat woman. Sic transit gloria ciraccus!

CHAPTER XIV.

NUGGETS OF SOLID WISDOM.

DURING these long months of perplexities, troubles, and retirement, Penn kept himself so closely connected with the ink-well that one of his worldly friends, an idle man given to vain babbling and profane conversation, advised him to go into the publishing business under the firm name of "Penn and Ink.") To which the stately Quaker gravely replied in a letter, saying that he wot not that he had none of his acquaintance of such a name as Ink, nor were it at all seemly that he should enter upon business covenants (though he must needs say it) with a person whom (although in all civility and none unkindness) yet not to have known more of his merits and conversation (being, as it were, well spoken and favored) and so it behooveth him. Then the profane babbler who made the idle and wicked jest felt that W. Penn had "sot down onto him."

He was a busy man and must have been a standing terror to publishers. He wrote, during the three years he was hunted and persecuted after James went out of the royalty business, his preface to Robert Barclay's works, a tract called "Just Measures," which was a sort of pioneer "women's rights" document. In the Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings of the Friends, women (as well as that noble animal, the man,) were allowed to take part, not merely in the ministry and subscriptions, but in the government of the church as well. In all religious denominations there has always been and ever will be a class of men, usually the stupidest and stingiest in the church, who consider a woman utterly incapable of comprehending, much less transacting, the simplest items of church business, which should be left entirely to the brethren, while the sisters should confine their humble duties as church members to the narrow but proper sphere of their limited abilities, and be content merely with collecting money, organizing and maintaining sociables, mite societies, fairs, missionary circles, relieving the poor, raising funds for the church carpet and a new organ, paying the sexton, clearing off the church debt, buying coal, and managing the summer picnic and the winter Christmas-tree, paying for the parsonage, making baptismal robes, washing dishes and making oyster-soup at the festival, organizing the lecture-course, paying the gas-bills, keeping up the prayer-meetings, attending all the funerals, buying Sunday-school libraries, not be bothering the men for money all the time, and keep quiet in business meetings when the men are voting to apply the funds now in the hands of the "Women's Home Mission" to the purchase of a desk and office chair for the church clerk. As there are men of this class in all churches to-day, so there were such men among the Friends then, and William Penn, with his usual good sense, maintained "So that as men and women make up the church, men and women make up the business of the church."

He also published "A Key Opening the Way to every Capacity how to Distinguish the Religion professed by the people called Quakers from the Perversions and Misrepresentations of their Adversaries;" and "An Essay toward the Present and Future Peace of Europe," which was a peace-society paper, and was a forerunner of the views and plans of the Universal International Lamb-and-Lion Society of to-day. He also published at this time "Some Fruits of Solitude in Reflexions and Maxims relating to the Conduct of Human Life." These maxims, as maxims are very apt to be, are plumb full of wisdom and quite generally neglected, it being so much easier to write them than to keep them. Penn's maxims wander over a wide range of subjects, and if he remembered them all himself, to do them, it is no wonder he was a good man. The following samples, extracted here and there from the mass of his wise sayings, will not burden the memory of the careful reader who skips this chapter, and for whose special edification they are here inserted:

Cunning borders very near upon knavery.

In his prayers man says, "Thy will be done;" but means his own; at least acts so.

Lend not beyond thy ability, nor refuse to lend out of thy ability; especially when it will help others more than it can hurt thee.

If thou rise with an appetite, thou art sure never to sit down without one.

Frugality is good, if liberality be joined with it. The first is leaving off superfluous expenses; the last bestowing them to the benefit of others that need. The first without the last begins covetousness; the last without the first begins prodigality.

Never marry but for love; but see that thou lovest what is lovely.

Frequent visits, presents, intimate correspondence, and intermarriages † within allowed bounds, are means of keeping up the concern and affection that nature requires from relations.

There can be no friendship where there is no freedom. It will speak freely, and act so too; and take nothing ill where no ill is meant.

Avoid company, where it is not profitable or necessary; and on these occasions, speak little, and last.

Give no advantage in argument, nor lose any that is offered. This is a benefit which arises from temper.

It were better to be of no church, than to be bitter for any.

God is better served in resisting a temptation to evil than in many formal prayers.

This is but twice or thrice a day; but that every hour and moment of the day. So much more is our continual watch than our evening and morning devotion.

Running streams are not so apt to corrupt as stagnant waters: nor itinerant, as settled preachers; but they are not to run before they are sent.

If I am even with my enemy, the debt is paid; but if I forgive it, I oblige him for ever.

"Open thou my lips, and then," said the royal prophet, "my mouth shall praise God." But not till then.

When Penn drops into politics and touches upon civil-service reform, he speaks truths that are new and strange to the statesmen who, by going without a girl in the kitchen and having their washing done at home, manage to save $45,000 a year out of a $5,000 salary. Penn was evidently no admirer of the noble scratcher or independent, for in speaking of party one of his maxims is, "Where right or religion gives a call, a neuter must be a coward or a hypocrite."

Among his maxims under this and similar heads are:

The safety of a prince, therefore, consists in a well-chosen council; and that only can be said to be so where the persons that compose it are qualified for the business that comes before them.

Who would send to a tailor to make a lock, or to a smith to make a suit of clothes?

Let there be merchants for trade, seamen for the admiralty, travellers for foreign affairs, some of the leading men of the country for home business, and common and civil lawyers to advise of legality and right, who should always keep to the strict rules of law.

Yet the public must and will be served; and they that do it well deserve public marks of honor and profit.

To do so, men must have public minds, as well as salaries; or they will serve private ends at public cost.

Government can never be well administered but where those entrusted make conscience of well discharging their places.

Five things are requisite to a good officer: ability, clean hands, despatch, patience, and impartiality.

Let men have sufficient salaries, and exceed them at their peril.

It is a dishonor to government that its officers should live on benevolence; as it ought to be infamous for officers to dishonor the public, by being twice paid for the same business.

He that understands not his employment, whatever else he knows, must be unfit for it; and the public suffer by his inexpertness.

They that are able should be just too; or the government may be the worst for their capacity.

While Penn was employing his abundant leisure in writing all these wise things and good books, his friends at court, remembering his unselfishness and kindness in the day of his own court influence, procured him what he most earnestly desired, a public hearing before the King, the result of which was that Penn's defence of himself was so able, simple, and convincing that even the King, who knew all the time he was innocent, told him "he was as free as ever," and should "not be molested or injured in any of his affairs." This was exceedingly kind in the King. He had already seized Penn's estates in Ireland, and had taken away his province, and now that Penn had nothing left that his most gracious Majesty could get hold of, he assured him of the royal protection and confidence. "If I have done anything you are sorry for," said this magnanimous King, "I forgive you."

Once more Penn was a free man, but his cup of bitterness was not yet full. His wife, Gulielma, whose health had long been failing, broken by sorrow for her husband's troubles, lived to see his name honorably cleared from every accusation, and then, on February 23, 1693, in the fiftieth year of her age, passed away "to the world that sets this one right." "In great peace and sweetness she departed," Penn writes, "and to her gain, but our incomparable loss, being one of ten thousand, wise, chaste, humble, plain, modest, industrious, constant, and undaunted." "She quietly expired in my arms, her head upon my bosom, with a sensible and devout resignation of her soul to Almighty God. I hope I may say she was a public as well as a private loss; for she was not only an excellent wife and mother, but an entire and constant friend, of a more than common capacity, and greater modesty and humility; yet most equal, and undaunted in danger; religious, as well as ingenuous, without affectation; an easy mistress and good neighbor, especially to the poor; neither lavish nor penurious; but an example of industry as well as of other virtues."

The beautiful character of Gulielma Penn, drawn by her husband and attested by her life and the testimony of the friends who enjoyed her society, draws us very near to the great Quaker in this crowning affliction, which fell upon him at the very time when his troubles were so many and his friends seemed so few. After Guli's death his heart was heavy and his pen was idle, until he was roused and called back to the pitiless workaday world and its active duties by startling news from Pennsylvania.

When that province was annexed to New York, Governor Fletcher went down to Philadelphia and summoned the Assembly to meet him. He paid no attention to the old legal form in calling them together, probably desiring to let them know there was no funny business about him, and they didn't have patient William Penn to fool with when he was around. He put on airs and talked about Brooklyn bridge and the L roads and going back to the "city," in a way that was exasperating to the Philadelphians, and affected to be afraid of wolves when he crossed Broad Street, and looked amazed and got out and walked when a Market Street car conductor tried to collect six cents fare of him, and found fault with Fairmount Park because it was so small, and talked so incessantly about what they did and the way they did it in "New Yawk," that the Assembly grew tired of him before it assembled, and the greater number of the members refused to take the oaths tendered to them. Fletcher then watered the oaths down to the mild consistency approved by their political palates, but assured them at the same time that he only did it because this was the first time and didn't count. After this, he said, they should take the oath straight, if it burned their throats raw.

Then he proceeded to the business upon the Speaker's table, and laid before them a requisition from Queen Mary for men and money to defend the frontiers of New York against the French and Indians. Albany was exposed to attack, and there were all the precious Knickerbocker families, seven hundred years older than the Flood, exposed to the murderous attacks of barbarous Indians, who would lift the hair of a genuine Knickerbocker even as the daughter of an Irish king chips the edges of your china. And if these families were utterly destroyed from off the face of the earth at that time, what was New York going to do in coming years for descendants of the placid marble bakers, who would rather be killed sitting down comfortably than make the exertion necessary either for fighting or running away? Somebody must protect these precious old duffers, and the Pennsylvanians were called upon and ordered to see that the Knickerbockers received no hurt.

The Quakers, in reply to this, intimated that if Governor Fletcher was spoiling for a fight, they had one right there, with which they could accommodate him, and before they took New York under their protecting wings they would defend Pennsylvania from his arbitrary and unjust encroachments. They insisted very humbly, but very obstinately, that he should confirm all the laws now in force in the province of Pennsylvania, reminding him that while they acknowledged him as their lawful Governor, and admitted that his administration superseded William Penn's, yet it was to be run on the old William Penn basis and principles; and they earnestly besought the new Governor not to forget it. Having thus declared their rights and manfully asserted their privileges, they passed, among other bills, an act imposing a tax of a penny a pound on the clear value of real and personal estate, and a poll-tax of six shillings a head, which they presented the Crown, with a request that one half thereof be allowed to the Governor,—which was more than the ungrateful legislators had ever done for William Penn. They made no grant of men or money for the defence of New York, for which wilful neglect Fletcher urged the King to form New York, the Jerseys, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut into one province, when the Quakers could be outvoted and compelled to furnish their quota of troops and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war. "In London," says Dixon, "the displeasure of William fell on the absent Governor, and the Privy Council even ordered the Attorney-General vigorously to inspect his patent, and see if some legal flaw could not be found in it which would furnish a pretext for its withdrawal altogether."

Once again Governor Fletcher made a requisition on Pennsylvania for money and troops for the defence of New York, and once more he did not get any. He modified his request this time, asking the non-combatants to clothe and feed the Indians, and thus secure their friendship for the colonies.

This was one hundred and eighty-eight years ago, but it seems that even at that day the North American Indians were unable, or unwilling, to clothe and feed themselves, and lived on the bounty of the Government just as they do even unto this day. They had in that far-away time the same excellent and carefully cultivated voice for blankets and guns and beef and bread and rum. And they would starve before they would work for a line of it. They were then, as to-day, paupers. When Penn is writing from Pennsylvania about killing wild turkeys and pigeons with sticks, and Richard Townsend drops his scythe to chase the wild deer out of his meadow, the Indians had to be clothed and fed to keep them from starvation and the war-path, and they would fight for the side that fed them the most. An Indian, after all, is more like an Indian than anything else.

The Assembly responded promptly. Had William Penn, who loved his model state as he loved his children, who had ever been indulgent and patient and liberal, and who in the days of his opulence supported the provincial court out of his own pocket,—had this man asked them for supplies, the Assembly would have paid no attention to his request. But when Governor Fletcher stood up and scowled and talked bass, and growled, and told them what he wanted and that he was going to have it, or—

The Assembly voted the same tax as before so quickly the Governor didn't have time to finish his threat, and the supply thus voted amounted to £760. None the less the Assembly stipulated that Thomas Lloyd and William Markham, Deputy Governors, should have £200 of this. Fletcher rejected this bill, and, the Pennsylvanians still manfully asserting that they had a right to dispose of the money they appropriated, the Assembly was dissolved, and no way had yet been discovered of making the Quakers take part in the French war. True to their principles, they would neither fish nor cut bait.

Just what the ancient Pennsylvanians thought of themselves at this time nobody knows, for they never told, and if they had said anything, honest shame would have impelled them to lie about it, rather than give posterity an honest judgment on themselves. In two years they had voted, with marvellous promptness, a supply of £1,500 to a soldier, a rough, rude man, a stranger careless of their rights or consciences, and William Penn, founder of their state, their benefactor and protector, was at this moment in England, begging his own colonists to lend him enough money to bring his family to America. And they wouldn't let him have it on any terms.

That is the manner of people our glorious old ancestors were.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LAY OF THE QUIT-RENTS.

STUNG by the ingratitude of the colonists for whom he had sacrificed his fortune, but still hoping that he might yet be able to work out to a bright fruition all his cherished hopes for his "model state," Penn set to work to get Pennsylvania back into his own hands. He sent the Queen a petition, begging an investigation of all matters referring to the alleged misconduct of his province, which was granted him, and resulted in his reinstatement as Governor of Pennsylvania. He was Governor once more, but he couldn't get out to his province. (He had about quit asking for his "quit-rents.") He had been singing on that key for ten years, and didn't seem to touch the popular chord. Now he tried to borrow £10,000 of one hundred of his most prosperous settlers, Dixon says, offering these blessed quit-rents as security. But the one hundred prosperous settlers wouldn't have it. Failing in this little negotiation, he resolved to govern his province in London, rather than accept a steerage ticket from the Emigration Society or work his way over.* He appointed William Markham his Lieutenant-Governor; Thomas Lloyd, his former deputy and one of his intimate friends, was dead. The Five Nations of Indians, weary of Pennsylvania cookery and supplies,† had weakened on the children of Onas and joined the French; the irreverent savages were swarming in the vicinity of Albany, knocking the Knickerbockers about as though they were only common people; it was feared that the Lenni Lenape would be won over to the majority, and who would care for the sons of Onas then? Penn knew that he had the law and the right by the treaty on his side, but he was afraid some of the Iroquois had not heard of the decision and might scalp a few Friends before they could be committed for contempt. He knew there were enough men in the province who would rather fight than eat, to protect the non-combatants. Eighty men were appointed as the war contingent of Pennsylvania, with enough money to run them three months. (And the Indians could * run them the rest of the time.)

* It never occurred to the Governor to apply for a pass, or to walk around.

† If the Pennsylvanians didn't "supply" the Indians better than they did their Governor, it is easy to see why the Indians went over to the French.

While he governed Pennsylvania vicariously, Penn wrote a few pamphlets, and a preface to the Journal of George Fox, entitled "A Brief Account of the Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers, in which their Fundamental Principles, Doctrines, Worship, Ministry, and Discipline are plainly declared;" and as the war in America was over, he seemed to think there was no necessity for his returning to his province now, and so remained in England writing pamphlets and preaching, regularly forgetting some of his own wise maxims and never learning that a house in London was a poor residence for a Governor of Pennsylvania. "It is but just," said Penn in one of his maxims, "that those that reign by their princes should suffer for their princes;" and his Pennsylvania colonists accepted his maxim. "Towards the settlers in his province," says Dixon, "Penn stood exactly in the position of a feudal lord: the soil and the government were his personal property. Though in his first charter he had given up many of his rights, enough remained to create strife and bitterness in men so jealous of power. It was sufficient that he traced his rights to a source alien to their choice, to rouse discontent."

This explains to a certain extent the obstinate refusal of the Pennsylvanians to pay the proprietor his long-sought quit-rents. The tax itself amounted to little,—a mere trifle,—but the principle was a great one. They would buy the land and pay for it, but once bought it was their own, and in their refusal to pay an annual quit-rent claimed by a feudal proprietor was involved the same principle that in later years Massachusetts maintained in her resistance to the tax on tea. It was the germ of democracy in Pennsylvania that grew into life and developed strength through all the years, until it came to full fruition in the city of its birth, and the Declaration of Independence only echoed the resistance of the Pennsylvanians against the quit-rents. And yet William Penn thought he was establishing a free republic, a pure democracy, a "model state," when he retained the quit-rents in it, and when he insisted so strongly on his rights and privileges. But while this liberty-loving spirit and abhorrence of feudalism explain the persistent refusal of the Pennsylvanians to pay their quit-rents, they do not excuse them for their niggardly and ungrateful treatment of Penn in their refusal to grant him the supplies they voted so promptly to Fletcher.

Among other important affairs of the province during the piping times of peace was the presentment of Robert Reman, at Chester, for "divining with a stick." The grand jury, fully awake to the demands and dangers of the times, also presented as a vicious book "Cornelius Agrippa's Teaching Negromancy." It is thought the grand jury made some search for the author of this vicious, profane, and idle work on necromancy, under the impression that he was somewhere in the province. But they did not find him. He was gone. Nobody knew where, but it was some place outside of the jurisdiction of the Chester grand jury. The Assembly, in 1696, secured, after a long wrangle, Lieutenant-Governor Markham's signature to a "bill of settlement" which largely increased the power of that body, giving it authority to originate bills, and to adjourn and assemble at its own pleasure rather than that of the Governor. And for these concessions it voted an appropriation of £300 for the support of the government and "for the relief of the distressed Indians of New York." The stern duty of killing off the superfluous white population of New York, which devolved upon these Indians, was a severe one, entailing upon them constant labor and almost sleepless vigilance. Many of the New-Yorkers had to be chased ten or fifteen miles before they could be caught and killed. Some of them were opposed to the operation of scalping, claiming that it was of no benefit whatever as a preventive, although the Indians assured them that no person ever had the small-pox after being scalped. Sometimes the white people resisted, and many Indians were seriously if not fatally injured in the performance of this duty. The braves had great callous bunions worn on their hands by the constant use of the scalping-knife, so they could now perform no manual labor. In some instances, depraved old Knickerbockers had palmed off wigs on the unsuspecting savages for scalps, and as the French refused to pay the usual bounty on these hair goods, the poor Indians lost heavily in such transactions. And when one noble child of the forest brought in a basketful of scalps taken from white children under three years of age, the French commandant refused to receive them and would not pay him a cent for the lot, and the poor Indian lost his whole week's work, and was so depressed and disappointed that he never scalped another child, but devoted all his time and talents thereafter to lifting the snowy locks of men and women of seventy years and upwards. And now the war was over, and the price of scalps had fallen until they weren't worth gathering, and when an Indian took one or two, just to keep his hand in, the pitiless New-Yorkers would fall upon him and cut him into so many pieces that the coroner would scratch himself bald trying to decide whether it was a powder-mill or freight-train.

Oh, how sad the peace-loving people of Pennsylvania were when they heard of the sufferings of these poor, overworked Indians! They voted a big appropriation for their relief right away.

This enabled the Indians to keep along until the next war broke out, when business would pick up a little. In accordance with this ancient precedent, it has ever since been the custom of the United States Government to take the best care of the worst Indians.

Penn continued to preach and write without molestation, save in one instance, when he was arrested while preaching from the balcony of an inn, the arrest being made, doubtless, at the instigation of a lot of commercial travellers who wanted to sit on the balcony and smoke, and did not come to that house to listen to a sermon. Penn showed a license from the bishop, however, and was immediately released by the magistrate, to the great mortification of the constable, who had to apologize and couldn't collect his fee. After this, being duly licensed according to law, Penn preached regularly.

In January of this year Penn married Miss Hannah Callowhill, a daughter of Thomas Callowhill, a Bristol merchant, and in a few weeks thereafter his eldest son, Springett, died. "Much of my comfort and hope," writes Penn, "and one of the most tender and dutiful, as well as ingenious and virtuous youths I knew, if I may say so of my own dear child, in whom I lose all that any father could lose in a child, since he was capable of anything that became a sober young man, my friend and companion, as well as most affectionate and dutiful child." It was indeed a heavy loss to the great founder of Pennsylvania, for to this son, inheriting alike the manly courage and firm convictions of his father and Guli Springett's "tenderness and softness of nature," Penn had hoped to leave his province. Now, alas! the next heir in succession, his son William, was a youth of some good qualities, clever, (generous to everybody except his father,) brave in anything but morality, wild in his tastes and desires, sociable, frank—in fact, one of those characters usually described as "nobody's enemies but their own," which means they are everybody's enemies. Young William was not exactly the promising sort of youth to leave in charge of a rather restless province. And even now that province was growing more and more restless, assailing the Governor and what he called his "rights" through his Lieutenant-Governor, and they were making poor Markham realize the truth of Penn's maxim, "It is but just that those that reign by their princes should suffer for their princes." They badgered him, accused him of defrauding the revenue, and of protecting and standing in with pirates and smugglers, and it was a short day when they couldn't invent or discover some new cause of complaint. All this time William Penn remained in England, visited Ireland, went to Deptford to convert Peter the Great, kept away from Pennsylvania entirely, and was thereby laying up a great store of experience from which he could some day write a pamphlet "On the Exceeding Great Vanity and Foolish Idleness of Attempting to Lead a Horse with a Halter Three Thousand Miles Long; Being as it were the Brief Experience of a Governor in London with a Province in America."

The Tsar of Russia, of all the Russias in fact, Peter the Great, was at this time working in the royal shipyard at Deptford, as a ship-carpenter. The ancient Quakers had mighty noses for a king, and their missionaries got into nearly all the royal palaces and prisons in Europe, in their passion for converting rulers and real dukes. They went for everything that sat on a throne, from the Pope himself down to the German prince of an eighty-acre Hesse something, or a Dutch monarch who lived and reigned with his cows in a wind-mill. Anything, so it was a king. Of course, when the Tsar came to Deptford, where he worked in the dockyard by day and got drunk wherever he could find cheap rum at night, the Friends made a dead set for him. Thomas Story and Gilbert Molleson visited him, and wrestled with him, and sought to interest him on the subject of religion, their own denomination preferred, because Peter was, after the religion of his fathers, a violently pious man. Peter was much amused at their great bareback hat act, which they explained very fully to him, and taught him how to do it. These two missionaries knew no Russian or German, and Peter knew no English, so they were soon convinced they had converted the Tsar. They gave him "Barclay's Apology," in Latin; gave him two copies of it, so that when he had read one copy to pieces he could start in on the other. Peter was greatly edified by this Latin book. He knew about as much Latin as the missionaries knew Russian, and probably did not read that book through in fifty years. But the joyous missionaries spread the tidings of the imperial conversion, and William Penn went with Prince Menzikoff to York Buildings, where Peter held his imperial sprees incognito, to land this mighty fish. He found the royal Muscovite curious and attentive, but still a most hopeless case of Quaker.

"You are a new people," said the Tsar; "will you fight any better than others?"

They told him they would permit the smallest state in South America to open their mail, insult their ministers, kill their chickens, and kick them all over their own house, without offering to strike back.

"Then," said the Tsar, "the United States is the right place for you. We have no use for you in Russia." *

Penn was an excellent German scholar, and conversed easily with Peter in this language. The Muscovite attended several Quaker meetings, and the Baptists and Presbyterians fairly howled with envy. Penn wrote the Tsar a letter, and Janney says, "The impression produced upon the Tsar by this intercourse with Friends in England appears to have been lasting." It may have been lasting, but it certainly wasn't deep, because Peter began beheading the Streltzi and fighting with his neighbors soon after he returned to Russia, and kept it up with little intermission as long as he was able to lead an army. When he wasn't actively at war with some foreign foe, he was beating his companions in uproarious sprees, and making various public and private free-for-all exhibitions of his violent and ungovernable temper. Peter the Great was not, in a moral view, a very promising convert for any denomination.

Penn cautiously, or rather, considering what his experience had taught him, incautiously waded into politics again. He couldn't keep out of it. The House of Commons was debating a bill against blasphemy, and Penn rushed in with a pamphlet—"A cautious Requisite in its consideration, showing the necessity of explaining the word Blasphemy, etc." The affrighted House, dreading lest Penn had once more become addicted to the pamphlet habit, dropped the bill before the Speaker could announce its full title, and promised, if Penn would not write any more pamphlets, they would never look at the document again.

It being now very necessary that Penn should return at once to Pennsylvania, he packed his trunks and went to Ireland, to hold a few meetings and look after his Irish estates, which by this time he had recovered, their former owners being without any such influence at court as Penn had been able to use for his friend Sir Robert Coltness. As Penn wrote to the Tsar, "the Quakers were an industrious people in their generation, and though against superfluity, yet lovers of ingenuity." And he was "ingenious" enough to live in London and govern, or rather govern at, a province in America, and hold on to the estates in Ireland which had been given his father as his reward for serving two opposing governments at the same time,—an "ingenious" piece of statecraft which has brought many of our modern statesmen to the ground. But they worked these things better in Sir William Penn's time.

Formerly, when Penn travelled, he left Guli and the children at home. On this occasion, it will be observed, Mrs. Penn and the children went with him. On this journey Penn preached a great deal, looked after his estate of Shangarry Castle, and was unable to get into prison or any serious trouble. On only one or two occasions was he molested. By an act of Parliament, any man was allowed to seize any horse worth more than five guineas belonging to a Catholic, and retain it on paying or tendering that amount. Under this "Act to make horse-stealing safe and easy," when a man saw a good horse in possession of a stranger, he merely accused the stranger of being a Papist, and offered him five guineas for his steed. When Penn and his friends, on one of their missionary tours in Ireland, arrived at Ross, they ordered their horses ferried across the Nore, while they "returned to the tavern and refreshed themselves after their long ride." * Two young officers saw the excellent horses of the Quakers, and, informing the Mayor that Penn and his friends were Catholics, took the animals, swearing to their information with the easy grace that was known only to the regularly ordained liars of the established church in the seventeenth century. A few of the horses had been ferried over before the authorized robbery could be made, and with these Penn and some of his friends went on their way, the other members of the party remaining to sue out a replevin for the rest of the animals. The officers who stole the horses were placed under arrest, and but for Penn's gracious intercession they would have been dishonorably dismissed the service.* Penn wrote a few pamphlets while in Ireland, and had a wind-mill with Rev. John Plympton, a deep-water Baptist, and a little set-to with the pamphlets with the Bishop of Cork, a home-rule agrarian, high Trinitarian, lights-on-the-altar young man. Penn whipped, in both instances. He says he did, himself.

At Cashel, the meeting of the Quakers was invaded by the Mayor at the instigation of the Bishop, who ordered the Friends to disperse, which they, with great promptness and submission to his will, did not. The discussion began to wax warm, when Penn, who was not in the meeting, but was in an adjoining room,—having heard, perhaps, that John Vaughton was going to preach,—sent for the Mayor, talked to him gently but firmly, as one talks to a friend when he comes to borrow money, and finally sent him away, and the meeting was resumed with redoubled silence. The Bishop afterward explained to Penn that he was angry because all his congregation went off to the Quaker meeting and left him only the bare walls to preach to. He did not mind preaching to the bare walls and empty benches, he said; in fact, he rather preferred them to his usual congregation, as being superior in general intelligence and Christianity, but they didn't pan out nearly so well in the assay for collections. Penn immediately wrote him a pamphlet, and the matter dropped. Afterward Penn held meetings and preached to the land-leaguers in Cork, and in Kildare, Limerick, Kilkenny, Tipperary, and other counties famous for the peaceful and law-abiding disposition of the natives. He also went to the barony of Imokelly, "where lay a great part of his Irish estates," and thence "to the barony of Ibaune and Barryoe, to view the rest of his estates in those parts." He had no trouble now about collecting "quit-rents" from his Irish tenantry. Ibaune and Barryoe and Imokelly were going to pay rents for nearly two hundred years before they got hold of the "Pennsylvania idea" of non-resident proprietors and quit-rents. Ireland was a thousand years older than Pennsylvania, but the ideas in Pennsylvania were as new as the land.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE GOVERNOR ON DECK.

RETURNING from Ireland, Penn was once more forcibly impressed with the fact that he was needed in Pennsylvania, and accordingly looked around for some place else to which he could go. Finally he compromised by going down to Deptford and seeing Thomas Story embark for the western world. But even the departure of Thomas Story did not allay the dissensions in the province. Markham had refused to pass the Jamaica Act against pirates, he had imprisoned a Commissioner for the Crown, just to show him who was running the machine in Pennsylvania, and Colonel Quarry, a revenue officer sent to the provinces by the King, made the most and the worst of the Lieutenant-Governor's folly; the provincial government, he reported, refused to assist him in catching pirates, and when he did catch any the Quakers refused to put them in jail, lest the pirate might have been pirating from a sense of duty, and thus be punished for conscience' sake.

At last matters became so bad in the province, or at least Colonel Quarry presented them in such a bad light, that the Council deprived Colonel Markham of his powers for five years. Added to this, word had reached Penn that there were altogether too many drinking-houses in Philadelphia for a city where all the houses looked so much like one another that it was a difficult matter for even a sober man to pick out his own residence after dark. And finally, Penn drew upon his agents in the province for "three hundred and odd pounds," and the draft came back protested. In those times it ruffled a man's spirits beyond all description to have a draft come back protested, as it does to-day; and as people are very much like other people, Penn received this wayward draft very much as a man receives a distant relative, poor but honest, whom he has not seen for thirty-two years and does not wish to see for thirty-two years more. Penn wrote to the delinquents at once. "Loving friends," he begins his letter—"Loving friends,* is it not my right by public obligation to six hundred pounds?"—because for that sum he had relinquished certain customs voted to him; that is, he had relinquished the customs, and now he had the six hundred pounds, at least he had it to get. And "all my expenses in two years' withstanding of Edward Randall, at my great charge," "my expenses in coming over and prosecuting the dispute with Lord Baltimore, which held near a year," "and last of all, my quit-rents, of which I have not seen for twelve years one sixpence." No matter how Penn began a letter to his colony, it was sure to run into the quit-rents before it got down to "Y'rs tr'ly."

* If they had loved him less and paid him more, they had been better friends.

His "loving friends" were deeply touched by the beautiful and just sentiments expressed in this letter, and immediately did not send him his money. They valued Penn as a friend; as a Governor, they respected him; as a religious teacher and guide, they venerated him; and as a just and humane creditor, they swindled him.

At last Penn, all the other places being closed, packed his hat-box and, accompanied by his wife and his daughter Letitia,* sailed for America,

* In some of the Quaker biographies of Penn this daughter is called Letty, and Penn himself calls her Tishe; but in a work of this gravity and severity such vain babbling and idle appellations cannot be admitted.

September 9, 1699. It does not appear that Mrs. Penn or Letitia felt any gnawing desire to come to America, nor did they want to stay after they got here, and Penn has been blamed for yielding to their importunities and influence, and absenting himself from the province which so much needed the wisdom and strength of his personal government. William Penn, Jr., did not come. This rapid young man remained in London to complete his education, having quite a number of evil and iniquitous habits to form before he felt himself competent to govern a turbulent province that was much given to feeding Indians and evading its quit-rents.

Three months the Penn family tossed on the waves of the restless sea, and then landed at Philadelphia on Sunday,—which was not right. The "yellow fever" had been raging in Philadelphia through the autumn months, and was just abating when Penn arrived. The death-rate had run up to seven and eight a day, and Story says in his journal: "Great was the fear that fell upon all flesh. I saw no lofty nor airy countenance, nor heard any vain jesting to move men to laughter; nor witty repartee to raise mirth; nor extravagant feasting to excite the lusts and desires of the flesh above measure; but every face gathered paleness, and many hearts were humbled, and countenances fallen and sunk, as of those who waited every moment to be summoned to the bar and numbered to the grave."

Friend Story also relates that the Yearly Meeting of the Friends was held at the usual time, notwithstanding the plague, and that "there was not one taken ill during the whole time of the meeting, either of those that came there on that account, or of the people of the town." Just why the Board of Health did not order the meeting to remain in session, then, until the epidemic disappeared, one cannot understand. Perhaps it was thought to be vain and undignified to use the Yearly Meeting as a general colonial vaccination.

When Penn landed at Chester, the usual thing happened. Two young men, (probably students from the Pennsylvania Military Institute, founded a great many years later,) fired a salute from two small field-pieces, and one of the men ran his arm down the gun to see if it was loaded.* It is an instructive study in human nature, this simple fact that even two hundred years ago two men and a cannon could not get together and separate with more than three arms for the crowd. Just enough to go around. But then one man, the monopolist of the party, would have two thirds of the stock. As usual, the sad affair cast a gloom over the entire community.

Penn lost no time in convening his Council and the General Assembly, and made them understand that the Governor was on deck. With his characteristic energy he fairly compelled the Assembly to enact laws for the "prevention of illicit trade" and "the discouragement of piracy." Perhaps it would have been just as well to make them for the discouragement of illicit trade and the prevention of piracy. But our glorious ancestors didn't seem to want to be too hard on the poor pirates.† Piracy was a genteel occupation at that time. Soon after Penn arrived at Philadelphia, two alleged pirates were arrested, and one of them was the son-in-law of Lieutenant-Governor Markham, Penn's cousin. It took the Assembly sixteen days to pass these two bills. When it is remembered how proud Penn was seventeen years before, when his first Assembly passed fifty-nine laws in three days, it will be seen how rapidly the legislature was improving and modernizing itself. The later legislature required more grease to make it run smoothly. And the pirates and illicit traders had evidently "greased" it.

"On their arrival at Philadelphia," says Janney, "the Governor and his family went to lodge* at Edward Shippen's, where they remained about a month. Penn then took a house known as the slate-roof house, on Second Street, between Chestnut and Walnut, at the southeast corner of Norris' Alley. Here was born, about two months after they landed, his son John, the only one of his children born in this country, and therefore called 'the American.'"

Pennsbury, the Governor's country mansion, on the Delaware near the falls of Trenton, was a very comfortable hovel for a starving child of poverty who couldn't get his quit-rents, and didn't care for the vanities and frills and "gaudy carpets and side-boards" of this idle old world. Markham originally laid out an estate here of about eight thousand acres, but the Governor gave much of it away. The hut in which the poverty-stricken Governor hid his gaunt form in the times of the quit-rent famine was two stories high, built of "fine brick," and covered with tiles. It had a front of sixty feet on the Delaware, with a superb view of the river. The house was forty feet deep, "and the brew-house, a large wooden building covered with shingles, stood back some little distance from the mansion, and was concealed among the trees." "I am a man of quiet tastes," said Penn, and then he went back to the brew-house, amid the all-concealing trees, and tasted something. The rooms of the manor-house were arranged in suites. "Suites to sweet," said Penn to Hannah, although the house had been built for Guli. The interior ornaments and decorations had been sent from England. The shanty was comfortably furnished. I quote from Dixon: "Mahogany was a luxury then unknown; but his spider tables and high-backed carved chairs were of the finest oak. An inventory of the furniture is still extant; there were a set of Turkey worked chairs, arm-chairs for ease, and couches with plush and satin cushions for luxury and beauty. In the parlor stood the great leather chair of the proprietor; in every room were found cushions and curtains of satin, camlet, damask, and striped linen; and there is a carpet mentioned as being in one apartment, though at that period such an article was hardly ever seen except in the palaces of kings. His side-board furniture was also that of a gentleman; it included a service of silver,—plain but massive,—blue and white china, a complete set of Tunbridge ware, and a great quantity of damask table-cloths and fine napkins. The table was served as became his rank, plainly but plentifully. Ann Nichols was his cook; and he used to observe in his pleasantry, "Ah, the book of cookery has outgrown the Bible, and I fear is read oftener; to be sure, it is of more use.' His cellars were well stocked; Canary, claret, sack, and Madeira being the favorite wines consumed by his family and their guests. Besides these nobler drinks there was a plentiful supply, on all occasions of Indian or general festivity, of ale and cider.* Penn's own wine seems to have been Madeira; and he certainly had no dislike to the temperate pleasures of the table. In one of his letters to his steward, Sotcher, he writes: 'Pray send us some two or three smoked haunches of venison and pork —get them from the Swedes; also some smoked shads and beefs;' adding with delicious unction, 'the old priest at Philadelphia had rare shads.'"

Moreover, Penn rode and drove only thoroughbred horses, of the best blood in England; kept his own "yacht,"—at least it was called a yacht then; it is described as a six-oar barge, and all the time he was in England he would allow no one to use it. William Penn and his family dressed well, and not in very Quakerly style. "The ladies wore caps and buckles, silk gowns, and gold ornaments." While in America, "Penn had no less than four wigs, all in the same year, purchased at a cost of nearly twenty pounds." He countenanced "innocent country dances" by his own presence and the attendance of his family. And while he lived well and in a manner and style befitting the station and dignity of the Governor of Pennsylvania to-day. It was a New Jersey brand, and a pint of it would double up a Conestoga sachem at forty yards.

and a well-bred English gentleman of noble family, he was charitable and generous, and the needy and sick ever found in him a friend who always coupled his words of cheer with a loaf of bread, and never took his hand out of his pocket empty. And his handsome house at Pennsbury, his well-spread table, his pleasant hospitality, and his Christian, unassuming, modest philanthropy wasn't costing the province of Pennsylvania a cent.

Pennsbury has passed away, with so many other mementos of the great Quaker in this country, into the hands of the omnipresent relic-hunter. Some time about 1780 the manor-house was torn down and distributed. A chair that belonged to Penn is now in the Pennsylvania Hospital;* John Smith has another; so has Thomas Jackson; so has Mrs. Belvawney; all the Joneses have one apiece; and every student of the University of Pennsylvania is presented with one when he graduates, and if he belongs to the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity, which was founded by Penn, he gets two. William Penn didn't do anything, while he was in America, but sit down in chairs for the benefit of posterity. He was a thorough-bred long-haired English setter.)

* This chair is genuine.

He hated tobacco, and "on one occasion Governor Jennings, of New Jersey (who was also an eminent minister among Friends), and some of his friends were enjoying their pipes, a practice which the gentlemanly Penn disliked. On hearing that Penn's barge was in sight, they put away their pipes, that their friend might not be annoyed, and endeavored to conceal from him what they were about. He came upon them, however, somewhat suddenly, and pleasantly remarked that he was glad they had sufficient sense of propriety to be ashamed of the practice. Jennings, rarely at a loss for an answer, rejoined that they were not ashamed, but desisted to avoid hurting a weak brother." * In connection with this pleasant anecdote it may be edifying to quote, from the same authority, from a letter written by the great tobacco-hater to his secretary about this time: "Let the Indians come hither and send in the boats for more rum, and the match-coats, and let the Council adjourn to this place." "More rum" has always been a very poor civilizer with the Indians. More tobacco and less rum has ever a much better effect upon the noble red man, and William Penn's ordinarily level head was very hilly on the subject of rum and tobacco.

* Janney.

Only the ruins of the brew-house, it is said, now remain of the pleasant estate of Pennsbury. The old manor-house itself has joined the innumerable caravan of Penn chairs, has been sat down upon literally, and lives only in the tender memories of white-haired old prevaricators who never saw it. But the memory of its courtly, gentle master, his manly qualities and Christian virtues, his patience and unselfishness, the sorrows and triumphs of his life, live on and on, over the decay of all these material and unnecessary reminders of his existence.

The winter of 1699 is said by the oldest inhabitants of that time to have been one of almost unprecedented severity, although, in deference to our own oldest inhabitants, we question if there have not been since that time winters of such exceeding cold that their resentments are not to be countenanced by any winter of the seventeenth century. Sutcliff, in his "Travels in Some Parts of North America," relates as something remarkable an anecdote of the Founder. One night William Penn, in his travels during this cold winter, lodged at the house of some person whose name is not given, or else is suppressed for family reasons, as it is the most important name in the story. Knowing the habits of that family in its entertainment of guests, people would like to know the family name, in order to avoid the houses of the descendants. It seems, from the narrative, that after Penn went to his room the family was seized with an uncontrollable desire to know how a Governor appeared when he crawled into the forbidding awfulness of a spare-room bed, and wrapped the drapery of the 36°-below blankets and zinc-plate sheets about him and lay down to freeze. So the family went up and successively pasted their eyes against the key-hole and looked in at the shivering Quaker preparing for death on Mont Blanc. Sutcliff says only a boy twelve years old went up, but Sutcliff lived near the seashore and must have been accustomed to relating stories for marines only, because everybody knows that the last person in the house to think of that key-hole act would be the boy.

He never thought of it until he saw the rest of the family coming down, suspiciously and supernaturally innocent as to demeanor, and red as to one eye. At all events, the boy went up and glued his eye to the key-hole, remained there until he was almost frozen, and then came down and reported that he saw the Governor kneel down at his bedside and repeat his evening prayer. Now, it is well known that the habit of prayer was not so unusual with William Penn that his host's family had to go about speering through key-holes to prove it on him. If the story is true, and undoubtedly it is true, although extremely unimportant, the only remarkable thing about it is that the Governor should kneel down to pray in a parlor bed-room in December. It seems hardly possible that the Governor of Pennsylvania should not know that it is the custom in America, when a man is sentenced to be confined for one night in the Arctic horrors of an old-fashioned "spare room," for him to plunge into bed with his overcoat and boots on, and chatter his shivering prayers under the frigid blankets.*

* Erratum.—Read blanket. There is never more than one.

In his "Historical Notes" Mr. Benjamin M. Nead says there was no choice of representatives for the Assembly of 1699 from New Castle, owing to a disturbance at the polls, and "Sheriff Joseph Wood forwarded, as his return, a half-sheet of blank paper only, and a letter containing this message: 'I here enclosed send you the names of the Council and Assemblymen chosen here on the 10th instant. To give you any reason for such an election is beyond my power; have had no discourse with any of the electors about it.'" The Sheriff was promptly summoned before the Council to answer for this vain babbling and frivolous and profane misconduct. He "disavowed any intention of wrong-doing, declaring that he had sent the blank sheet of paper as a joke."

This is the first joke on record in Pennsylvania. It is interesting as a finely preserved specimen of a joke of the vintage of 1699, and no less interesting is the record which shows in what earnest and severe temper the Council of that day gazed upon the pioneer joker of the province of Pennsylvania, the forerunner of Charles G. Leland, Charles Heber Clark, Francis Wells, and other jesters of a lighter and brighter era, when a man could perform a single-hand joke without being arrested and dragged before the Council for it. This Pennsylvania joke was preceded in Virginia by the first touch of "American humor" about eighty-one years,* thus showing that with all the wonderful advantages of the virgin soil and marvellous climate of the new world, it required nearly a century for a germ of humor to develop and grow to the full fruition of a strong and fearless joke, which spread its bright wings to catch the morning breeze, and soared into the broad empyrean of progressive thought and emancipated intellect, a glad, free thing, with Italics at one end and a hyphen in the middle to prop it up, and translate its joyous song to the dull ear of the wise and good.†

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SKELETON IN THE WOOD-PILE.

THE colored brother was now discovered lurking in the gloomy recesses of the dark and silent wood-pile.

He was there when Penn founded the Keystone State. Penn found him here when he landed in Philadelphia, clanking fetters and all. Queen Elizabeth had the honor of extending the commerce of England to the slave-pens of the Gold-Coast, and long before her time, in continental countries, anything made in the image of God, with a black skin, was considered property. Slaves were held in all the American colonies, and if a man did not own slaves, it was usually because he was too poor to buy them. In common with all other good people, the ancient Pennsylvanians bought their servants rather than hire them. When William Penn, in 1685, wrote about training up two men and a boy in the art of gardening, he says, "It were better they were blacks, for then a man has them while they live." Fourteen years before that time George Fox had advised the Friends of Barbadoes, in regard to their slaves, that "after certain years of servitude they should make them free," but it does not appear that any of the slave-owning Friends unloaded because George Fox said so.

The colored man remained in the seclusion of the fuel department until 1688, only six years after the founding of Pennsylvania, when, as we have already seen, some of the German Friends, at their meeting in Germantown, spoke their minds freely on the subject of human slavery, and made the first protest against it in America. The meeting itself as a body, however, dodged the issue, and "judged it not to be so proper for this meeting to give a positive judgment in the case." But the personal protest of Daniel Pastorius and his friends, though not adopted by the Society, made itself felt, and eight years later the Yearly Meeting again took up the irrepressible subject very gingerly, and advised that "Friends be careful not to encourage the bringing in of any more negroes, and that such as have them be careful of them, bring them to meetings, and restrain them from loose living as much as in them lies, and from rambling abroad on first days or other times."

The Germantown leaven was working, although not until eighty years later did the Society of Friends embody in its discipline an outspoken prohibition of slavery, and nearly two centuries had passed away when the sword, with bloody judgment, made into a righteous and irrevocable decree the brave protest so bravely spoken by the Friends of Germantown. The Quaker meeting-house was the cradle of abolitionism and emancipation.

In the spring of 1700, Penn made an effort to "improve the condition of the negro by legal enactments." He introduced in the Council a bill to "regulate the morals and marriages of negroes." This bill was readily passed by the Council, the members of that body being all members of the Society of Friends. But the Assembly promptly killed the bill when it came into their hands, and under the sanction of this body the slaves went on marrying as numerously and carelessly as they pleased, and pursued the unguarded ways of their earthly pilgrimage with no check upon their baggage or their conduct.

The Founder now turned from the Assembly to his own Society, and at the next monthly meeting laid this subject before it, and besought the Friends to "be very careful in discharging a good conscience toward the Indians and negroes in all respects." The meeting appointed a meeting for the negroes, "to be kept once a month." The Friends thus early sought to promote the spiritual welfare of their slaves. But they still held them as slaves, and emancipation as a means of grace was not resorted to until many years afterward. William Penn, it is true, gave all his slaves their freedom in his will, although the will appears to have been carried out as wills usually are—as the heirs and executor wish it, and not as the testator intended. A letter from James Logan to Hannah Penn, quoted by Janney, says: "The proprietor, in a will left with me, at his departure hence, gave all his negroes their freedom, but this is entirely private; however, there are very few left. Sam died soon after your departure hence, and his brother James very lately. Chevalier, by a written order from his master, had his liberty several years ago, so that there are none left but Sue, whom Letitia claims, or did claim, as given to her when she went to England, but how rightfully I know not. These things you can best discuss. There are besides two old negroes quite worn, that remained of three which I received eighteen years ago of E. Gibbs's estate of New Castle Co."

It appears not to have been a very sweeping emancipation, after all. Penn meant well, but these things can be and are done much better by the living than by the heirs of a dead master. To a lame man, it would appear from this letter that of the slaves freed by this will, Sam died before his master got to England; James died soon after; Chevalier was free because Penn manumitted him in time and by his own hand; Letitia, who was not in the emancipation business, laid her gentle hands upon Sue, will or no will; and there were left, to enjoy their freedom under the Governor's will, two decrepit old darkies, who had worked themselves clear out as slaves, were not now worth their keep, and probably at this time were not able to take care of themselves. Such was old-fashioned emancipation.

William Penn, however, was ever a kind and humane master, and his intentions were just and noble. But this is one of the instances where "his confidence in persons less virtuous than himself" disarranged his plans and vetoed his wishes. While he owned slaves, it must be borne in mind that the morality of his time approved of slavery, and he was a better master to his slaves than some of our neighbors are to their employes.

An absence of sixteen years had done its certain work in weaning the rugged and healthy infant province Penn had planted in the wilderness away from its loving Founder. Sixteen years; and such years they had been, pregnant with great events, restless with the birth and growth of ideas. Twice in that time Penn had seen the greatest throne in the world made vacant, once by the mighty hand of death, and once by the hand of the people scarcely less mighty. Persecution, cruelty, and bloodshed, in the sacred name of religion, had raged over the kingdom, desolating homes, filling the prisons, and drenching the block with the bravest and purest blood of England. Sidney and Monmouth died under the axe; Jeffreys had run the limit of his evil and cruel career; James, torn from his throne, had met defeat in England and disgraceful rout in Ireland; Penn from the estate of a prince had fallen to the obscurity of a fugitive, death had entered his household and taken away the best and dearest; war with France broke out, and closed with honor to the English arms; the dissenters of England had at last worn out persecution by patience and matchless courage and glorious faith in the righteousness of their cause, until the meeting-house and conventicle were as safe as the church, and no man's prayers could shut him in a dungeon; and with all these wonderful changes in the world in which he lived these sixteen years, could Penn imagine that the New World was standing still? Did he suppose he would find his "model state" just where he left it? Could he not understand the murmur of discontent already flowing from colony to colony, and spreading a contagion of restlessness through the provinces? Sixteen years? In those stirring days that was time enough to build a new state on the ashes of an old.

Penn had seen this in England: he was a child when Cromwell builded the Commonwealth on the ruins of the throne, and a boy when the King came back to his own and the throne was established on the wreck of the Commonwealth; he was a man of broad experience, keen insight, and wide political influence when William stepped on the neck of James to ascend the throne. And yet with all these instructive scenes rolling before him on the panorama of events, he stayed away from his province in the New World and thought he could govern it. Sixteen years! The Blue Anchor Tavern that he saw finished on Dock Street had been hidden by the grander houses of the city he planned; for now more than "a thousand finisht houses" his capital boasted. Immigrants fleeing from the lash of persecution had crowded into his province and made it prosperous. In the wake of its prosperity came the flotsam and jetsam of the tide. Men came to Pennsylvania who cared naught for Penn, and less for his religion; men came who had never or scarcely heard of William Penn; men came who knew him only to dislike him; men came who hated his ideal of the perfect state; good men, bad men, weak men, slavers, smugglers, pirates, men of all conditions came to Pennsylvania, with their own political ideas. When Penn returned to his province after his absence of sixteen years, he did not find the state he left. He found a people who knew not Penn, and who regarded a governor or proprietor as a figure-head that should be allowed only the least possible amount of power.

The seeds of democracy Penn had sowed in the wilderness * had taken root and flourished with the unexpected luxuriance of a Canada thistle or the dog-fennel of the prairies. The province had grown democratic even more rapidly than Penn had anticipated or wished. While he had been sixteen years in England, and most of that time a constant attendant upon the King, a favorite with royalty and a power in the court, the colonists had been receiving a very different education in America, and all their dealings with the Crown only served to intensify their dislike for it.

The Assembly met Penn this year in an attitude of "armed neutrality" if not open hostility.* It was called to meet at New Castle as a small libation of taffy for the lower counties, and Penn briefly recommended a revisal of the laws, the settling of property, and a supply for the support of the government, closing by recommending to the House amity and concord among its members. The Assembly did not waste any time on the promotion of amity and concord; no committee was appointed on that subject. The only matter it appeared to harmonize upon in perfect unity was the revision of the laws. They were ready, willing, and anxious to annul the old and frame a new constitution right away; but Penn was less anxious for this heroic method of mending the old constitution, and but little progress was made in that direction at this session. Then the representatives from the territories and the province began wrangling over the quota of representation. The members from the territories went in for minority representation. They claimed that as the territories had the smallest population, they should therefore have the largest representation, in order to strike a general average. They threatened to secede at once if ever the province organized any more counties, "and thereby more representatives were added, so that the number of the representatives of the people in legislation in the province should exceed those of the territories." Finally this was compromised by Penn, who proposed "that in all matters and things whatsoever wherein the territories were or should be particularly concerned, in interest or privilege, distinct from the province, then, and in that case, no act, law, or ordinance, in any wise, should pass in any Assembly in this province, unless two parts in three of the members of the said territories, and the majority of the members of the province, should concur therein." This quieted the territory men for the time, but they promised to bring up the subject of the union at the next session, and at every succeeding session, in fact.

Then there was the supply for the support of the Government; £2,000 were to be raised, and in levying the tax, the members for the province intimated that if the territories insisted on an equal representation and voice and vote in all matters pertaining to the state, they should also raise half of the supply. But the territory members declined the flattering proposition. They explained that they wanted to strike a fair average in this matter, and would agree to a just and righteous compromise. They would agree to do all the talking and most of the voting, and let the members for the province raise all the money. How did that strike them? It did not seem to strike the provincial representatives as altogether the proper caper, and in turn they submitted four propositions, each looking to an equal tax on property both in the provinces and territories; but the territories voted them down, being in a minority. Lack of space forbids my explaining how this was done. The representatives of the territories had only one rule in voting on any bill or motion. When the province voted "yea" the territories voted "nay," and when the province voted against any measure the members for the territories worried that measure through, if they had to sit up all night. The members for the territories seem to have been very pleasant, peaceably disposed men.*

Once more the wisdom and long-suffering patience of the Governor cast the crude petroleum of compromise upon the troubled winds of legislative debate, with the proposition that the province should raise £1,575, and the territories £425. This looked fair to the territories, and the Pennsylvania Assembly went home, having for the first time since the founding of the province voted a supply to the only Governor who, up to that time, deserved one at their hands.

A terrible riot broke out in East Jersey about the time the legislature adjourned. Men stood out in the streets and called one another all sorts of names; casual bricks—whole and bats—strewed the highways thick as the leaves that strew autumnal brooks in Vallambrosa,† only somewhat harder and rather larger; windows were broken, grass was pulled up by the roots, and tumultuous horror brooded over the pleasant valleys of Appeljacque,—all because an insolent criminal on trial asked an East Jersey magistrate some questions that his honor couldn't answer. The august courts of this country had not at that time attained the Guiteau state of passive submission.

When Penn heard of the riot, he immediately pulled on his big boots, and calling "twelve of the most respectable Friends about him," girded on his two-handed pamphlet with the terrible name, and rode for the scene of conflict. But long, long before he got there, the insurgents heard he was coming and gat them unto their homes in greate terrour, and did there abide in all feare and submissfulnesse.

Penn had now some leisure to attend to the noble red men. As usual, the guileless savages had some land to sell, and they knew Penn was the best man in the world to buy land. Before he sailed for England, in 1684, Penn bought "all that tract of land lying on both sides of the river Susquehanna and the lakes adjacent, in or near the province of Pennsylvania," from the Iroquois Indians, for £100. Now the Susquehanna Indians came into court, and said there was a cloud on Penn's title; that the Iroquois could not make him a deed of that land, because they had only acquired it temporarily, and in the most unquakerlike way, by pounding the ground with the Susquehannas, who were the rightful owners, tomahawking a divers many of them, and driving them away from their own land, which they had themselves, with great pains and much scalping, acquired in a like manner from its former owners,—although they didn't say anything about that,—and now, they didn't want to make a fuss about it, but if William Penn really wanted that land, they would sell it to him cheap (for cash, or on long time, say fifteen minutes,) with approved security.

So Penn, believing the Indians, and knowing not that they were taught to lie before they were weaned, bought this same land over again, this time from the Susquehannas.

The Susquehannas got their money and goods for the land, and then went back to the forest primeval, and around the blazing camp-fire, under the whispering hemlocks, in the long shadows of the stately pines, and amid the small but numerous inhabitants of their humble tepees, they told what a good thing they had made out of those old Iroquois timber-claims on the Susquehanna. The other Indians, being assured that in the matter of a land-deal William

Penn was but as a sucker, said, "Go to; let us arise and sell Brother Onas these Iroquois lands ourselves."

So Connoodaghoh, King of the Conestogas, and a lot of other kings, his most gracious majesty King of the Shawnees, "the restless nation of wanderers," the lynx-eyed chief of the Ganawese,* and a king of the Onondagas, came down to Philadelphia in April, 1701, and told William Penn that he might be and was the only genuine Onas of Philadelphia, but they were the Onas of that Iroquois reservation, and he must not neglect to recollect it. Penn at once opened up another line of presents, and the tramps of the forest graciously confirmed the two purchases he had already made of this same land. It may be that Penn kept on buying this Iroquois land of new Indians so long as he remained in America, but there is no record of any further sales.

In order that the Indians might be protected from swindling traders, it was decided at this last treaty that only Penn himself and his immediate successors should have authority to license Indian traders. This was the beginning of the monopoly in post-sutlerships.

It was also decided by the Governor and his Council "that no rum should be sold to any Indians but their chiefs, and in such quantities as the Governor and Council shall think fit, to be disposed of by the chiefs to the Indians about them as they shall see cause." This made thin gleaning for the other Indians, and the haughty chieftain gradually fell into the royal habit of doing all the drinking for his tribe. It kept his most gracious majesty busy, but he was fond of employment, and loved to toil at the earthen jug, while his gentle wife or two chewed the bear-skins soft and pliable, or idly hoed the rustling maize, or with resounding blows and muffled grunts laid in the winter wood.

During this summer, a letter from the King was laid before the Assembly, demanding a contribution of £350 for the construction and maintenance of forts in New York. The Assembly was greatly distressed. It had a hard time all round. Whenever William Penn wanted a supply or asked for his quit-rents, they reminded each other that although the Governor was a Quaker, all the colonists were not, and it didn't make any difference to them whether he got any supplies or not. But when the King called upon them for a war appropriation, they suddenly remembered that their constituents, for the greater part, were Quakers, and their peculiar views must be regarded with all due respect by the Assembly. After mature deliberation, therefore, the Assembly declined to vote the supply required by the King, on the remarkable grounds of the tax recently levied for the support of the Government, "and the quit-rents due"! Those blessed quit-rents! The casual observer would be apt to remark that they were due, as not a shilling of them had been paid in eighteen years. And then to strengthen their reasons with the most glaring incongruities that could be suggested, the Assembly—Quakers, Baptists, Methodists, peace-makers, fighters, and all—begged the Governor to assure the King that they were ready to comply with his demands "as far as their religious persuasions would permit."

This grows better and better, when we remember this is the same devout body that curtly refused to pass a bill regulating Christian and decent marriages among the negroes. And finally the territories came in with the crowning reason, declaring they were in a most defenceless condition themselves, without arms, ammunition, militia, or officers, and asked to be excused from "building forts in New York while they were unable to build them for their own home defence."

The Assembly was dismissed after this magnificent jumble. Certainly it had earned the right to go home and place its several heads in brine. It had distinctly stated that it could not vote a war supply to build forts in New York because—

It had just voted all the supply necessary for the government expenses;

Eighteen years of quit-rents, which they never had paid and were never going to pay, were due;

They had religious scruples against building forts; and

They were going to build some for themselves as soon as they were able.

When the Ancient Free and Accepted Assembly of Pennsylvania sat down and harnessed its massive intellect to the mental task of evolving a few consecutive reasons why it shouldn't spend any more money than it had to, the result was an intellectual three-decker with an iron ram and an Ericsson turret, that made the effete monarchies of Europe tremble on their crumbling thrones, while the prophetic aureole about the dome of Independence Hall glowed like an Alpine sunset on the Wissahickon.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GOVERNING AT LONG RANGE.

AS he had now been in the province nearly two years, it was about time for the Governor to go back to England. He seemed to like Pennsylvania more the less he saw of it, and wasted very little of his precious time in his "model state." Various reasons urged his return to England at this time. There was in the mother-country a strong party in favor of extinguishing the proprietary governments, and vesting the rule of the colonies in the Crown, and a bill to that effect had already been introduced in the House of Lords. It was thought best by the leading men of the colony that Penn should at once set sail for England. They appeared anxious to have him go, possibly realizing the fact that they had their own way more fully when the Governor was three months out of reach—a view of the case that seems to have missed the Governor entirely.

In addition to these political reasons, there were others equally weighty. Mrs. Penn and Miss Penn were both averse to remaining in America. They had enjoyed the novelty of a visit in the new country, and did not appear to care for any more of it, failing to enter into the Governor's enthusiasm for taming the Indians and building a model state, and making the wilderness to blossom as the rose. Penn himself writes, at this time: "I cannot prevail on my wife to stay, and still less with Tishe [Letitia]. I know not what to do. Samuel Carpenter seems to excuse her in it, but to all that speak of it, say I shall have no need to stay in England, and a great interest to return." And when a man's wife and daughter both put down their feet and say they will not stay in this horrid country another minute, and they will go back to England to-morrow if they have to walk every blessed step of the way, and, to make it worse, Samuel Carpenter, who might have been in better business, comes along and aids, abets, and encourages the women in their distracting opposition to the Governor's wishes,—it is easy to see the Governor must surrender, and place three months of ocean between him and the province that constantly required his presence. Or rather, he required the presence of the province, if he wanted to hold it and mould it to his own will. The province got along in its own way while the Governor was in London, but it wasn't Penn's way at all. Penn's own wishes would have held him in America, for he writes, "My inclinations run strongly to a country and proprietary life." And then he packed up and went straight to London. But he assured the Assembly in his opening speech that "no unkindness or disappointment shall ever alter my love for the country, and resolution to return and settle my family and posterity in it."

Before he sailed, the new Assembly was convened, and the Governor told them to review their laws, enact such new ones as they thought best, and consider the King's request for the New York forts appropriation, referred from the last Assembly. In reply to which the Assembly promptly refused to build one solitary embrasure, not a lunette, not even a rifle-pit; it would not vote one shilling for a fort.

But it would and did trouble the Governor with a long address of twenty-one articles, in which the Assembly and citizens asked for some things the proprietary was willing to grant, some that he granted unwillingly, and some that he wouldn't listen to. Among other things, the modest freemen merely asked that the Governor should fix the price of all his unsold land at the extravagant rate of "one bushel of wheat in the hundred." The Assembly must have had this request stored away in the ice-house all summer. When any other man held his land a few years he was entitled to sell it at the "raise," but the price of the Governor's land was to be immutably fixed. Even at this distance, this request still retains a shuddering sensation of frostiness, when we remember that Penn bought all his land of King Charles, and then of numerous Indians in rapid succession.

Then the colonists had one more little favor to ask. It wasn't much, and they disliked to bother him about such a trifle, but would the Governor be good enough to lay out all his bay-marshes and swamp-lands as common lands? The Governor's hair began to stand on end.

Oh yes, and one thing more: they wanted the common use of some vacant land in the city of Philadelphia, and the free use of the river-bank at the ends of the streets on the Delaware and Schuylkill; and, by the way, they wanted all of his islands near the city to be reserved free to them for their supplies of winter fodder. Penn gave them the vacant lots and the river-fronts, but he held on to the bay-marshes and the islands.

Was there any other business before the House? They could not think of anything else of importance. Oh, the appropriation for his journey to England? Well, that was all right; they weren't going to make any. If he wanted to go to England, he was at liberty to go. It was the privilege of any citizen. But he could pay his own way or hoof it, the Assembly didn't very much care which. Or, he might stay in Pennsylvania. It was a good country, and they were going to stay themselves. They were glad enough to get away from England, and they had no desire to go back to a country where they spelled apple with an "h." If he wanted money, he could sell land.

And that is just what he had to do. He had five or six hundred thousand or million acres of land,—he didn't know which it was,—and he sold a few counties to pay his way back to England. To this sad state of penniless destitution was the once wealthy Governor and proprietor of Pennsylvania reduced. Ah, how few of us, blessed with comfortable homes and a good salary of $850 a year, know of the penury and woe and pinching poverty and white-faced want stalking like grim spectres through the palaces of our Governors! Let us, while we pity the griping poverty of the starving owners of whole reservations of land, learn wisely the lessons of their misfortunes; let us lay our several hands upon our respective hearts, and solemnly declare we will never bite off more than we can chew.*

Penn was greatly displeased with the excellent appetite this Assembly displayed for his lands, and in a conference on this subject he told them very plainly that "he would never permit an Assembly to meddle with his property, lest it should be drawn into a precedent." And that was just what the Assembly was after. Penn saw about as little of his own province as any man in England; his successor might be an unscrupulous, grasping man, also living in London and holding at exorbitant prices his inherited lands and privileges, and the Assembly, wiser in its day and generation than the Governor, was anxious to secure these lands and privileges to the people and immigrants of future generations while it could be done. It is true there was an element of calm iciness in the Assembly's demands, but, after all, it was singing on the right key.

Some time during the session a bill was introduced to confirm the revenue laws passed at New Castle, and, as might have been expected, every member from the territories was on his feet in a minute, declaring that such a bill intimated that laws enacted in the territories were invalid. They would be recreant, Sir, to their principles, and false, Sir, to their constituents, Sir, if, Sir, they remained supinely, Sir, in their seats, Sir, when this galling insult, Sir, was hurled at the grand old constituency, Sir, it was their honor and privilege, Sir, to represent, Sir. And then they said they would and did boldly and fearlessly fling back the infamous insinuation into the teeth, Sir, of the cowardly insinuators; they would beard this lion of tyrannical and arbitrary despotism in the bud; they would trample this gathering cloud of usurpation under their feet, and in the might and majesty of a downtrodden people they would hurl the proud invader from his gory seat and plant the flag of freedom there! (Loud cheers and cries of "Go on!" from the galleries, which were promptly checked by the Speaker.) And with this burst of legislative eloquence and grammar the representatives from the territories put on their hats, and seceded.

Penn interposed in behalf of union and harmony, and after repeated conferences the territory members agreed to come back on condition "that nothing might be carried over their heads by outvoting them." You see, the territories did not want very much, but what they did want they wanted like everything. At last, on the promise of the Governor that a clause should be inserted in the charter providing for their separation in three years, the seceders returned to the House.

This Assembly adopted a new constitution, passed one hundred bills, and adjourned on the 28th of October. The day following, Penn presented the inhabitants of Philadelphia an act of incorporation for the city, appointing Edward Shippen Mayor and Thomas Story Recorder, and placing other friends approved by himself in office, so that the machine might start off in the best shape, and leave as little work as possible for the "Committee of One Hundred," which before long began to exhibit signs of an eager desire to stick its shovel into the municipal sand and have something to say about electing the city officers itself.

The Indians came in great numbers to bid Penn good-by, as it had been noised abroad he was going to return to England, and it was quite generally understood that liberal quantities of backsheesh would be dispensed, after Penn's usual manner. The heart-breaking sorrow of these simple-minded children of the forest at Penn's departure has often been justly and feelingly portrayed. Penn had been a friend to the Indians.* He was the first white man to treat them honestly. He was also the last. They had sold him the same piece of land

* This remarkable and somewhat startling statement has been made by other authorities. Clarkson, Janney, Dixon, the Logan MSS., the memoirs of the Penn. Hist. Soc., the Proprietary Papers, and various MSS. have asserted it, and even Weems admits it.

many times, and they now wept to think they might never be able to sell him that old Iroquois timber-claim again. They wished they had sold it oftener while they were at it.

In the dim gloaming of the misty future, other Governors would come who would buy their lands with bayonets; who would fence them on a reservation of sage-brush and alkali ponds, and then abuse them because they didn't kill deer and buffalo on a reservation where a coyote would starve to death in ten minutes. True, they had never seen very much of Penn. He loved them, but he had spent only four or five years in their country in all his life. Whenever they did see him, however, they scooped him. They struck him rich every time they made a deal with him in land, and they gloomily thought of the day when another Governor should arise, and Edward Marshall would walk clear around the whole State of Pennsylvania in a day and a half. Their eyes were dim when for the last time in this world they looked upon the noble Quaker, and when they said good-by,* and turned to their humble lodges in the wilderness, sorrow gat hold upon them with the heart-breaking grip of a tight boot in church.

Penn's last official acts in Philadelphia were to appoint James Logan his agent and Andrew Hamilton Deputy Governor, and then, on the 30th of October, his delighted family hurried on board. (The Governor sorrowfully said good-by to his friends and quit-rents.) With a fair wind and a good tide the ship dropped down the river; the faces on the wharf grew indistinct and blurred; the "thousand finisht houses" of Philadelphia blended into the autumnal foliage of the surrounding forests, and the hazy atmosphere of October fell like a veil over the bright hopes and fair dreams of human liberty that had been laid in the grand foundations of the mighty state yet to be builded thereon in honor and honesty by the hands of a free people; the blue lines of the hills, the winding river, and the little city melted into the embracing skies, and the fair province of Pennsylvania passed forever from the gaze of its Founder. Neither in life nor in death was it ever to receive him again. He loved it so much, and he saw it so little, and in death his body was fated to lie thousands of miles away from the land that most sincerely honors his memory—the land that hands his great name down to posterity in that of the state he founded by "deeds of peace."

But his loving colonists had one more grab at him. When the ship reached New Castle, David Lloyd and Isaac Norris, executors of Thomas Lloyd, presented a petition, asking for compensation for Thomas Lloyd's nine years' service as president of the Council, that one thousand acres of land be given him for that amount taken away from him by the Maryland claim, and that some other lands Lloyd had bought should be located. Penn readily gave and located the land as desired, but in regard to the other "compensation" said, "What I have not received I cannot pay. I am, above all the money for lands I have sold, twenty thousand pounds sterling out of purse upon Pennsylvania, and what has been given me pays not my coming and expense since come."

From shipboard the Governor wrote his agent, James Logan: "Use thy utmost endeavors to receive all that is due me. Get in quit-rents, look carefully after all fines, forfeitures, escheats, deodands, and strays that shall belong to me as proprietor. Get in the taxes and Friends' subscriptions, and use thy utmost diligence in making remittances to me by bills of exchange, tobacco,* or other merchandise. . . . Judge Guest expects a hundred pounds a year of me. I would make it fifty. . . . Let not my cousin Durant want, but supply her with economy." †

The good ship Dalmahoy made a quick passage, and after weeks of the usual marine misery, Penn landed in England. When he got there, he learned that the bill for making all the American provinces Crown colonies had been dropped, and he didn't know just what he came to England for. Still, this same legislation would probably be attempted in a succeeding Parliament, and it was evident that Penn was once more going to maintain the Pennsylvania executive mansion in London, for another indefinite period.

James died an exile. Three months before

* He didn't like people to smoke it, but he would sell it.

† Economy was a very necessary article in every household. Supplied with plenty of economy, cousin Durant would be happy as a king.

Penn's return to England, his royal son-in-law was gathered to his fathers, if not to his father-in-law, and Anne, the daughter of James, reigned in William's stead. One of the first places we hear of Penn, after he reached England, is at court, as usual, where he was once more in favor. Penn lived with his family in Kensington, kept out of politics, wrote another volume of maxims for the guidance of other people, and a few pamphlets and a preface or two, and worried over the news from America, which continued to be of a most discouraging nature. The territories had seceded, Deputy Governor Hamilton died in 1703, and the new Assembly quarrelled with Edward Shippen, who succeeded him; and when the Governor and Council proposed to confer with the House as to the time for holding the next session, the Assembly showed them all about that by simply and promptly adjourning to the 1st of May, without troubling the Governor and his Council for any opinion or voice in the matter. Year after year the Assembly grew more and more independent, and it never had cared very much for a Deputy Governor anyhow.

Young William Penn was now sent out to Pennsylvania, not indeed with any hope of his improving the province, but for the purpose of reforming the young man. His father begged Logan, in touching terms, to look after the youth. "Possess him; go with him to Pennsbury, contract and recommend his acquaintance. No rambling to New York." (Penn knew that if ever the young man got into the habit of going to New York, all hope of reformation was at an end.) "He has wit," adds the father, "kept the top company, and must be handled with much love and wisdom. And get Samuel Carpenter"—that was the useful person who "excused" * Mrs. Penn in insisting on returning to England—"Edward Shippen, Isaac Norris, Phineas Pemberton, Thomas Masters, and such persons to be soft, and kind, and teaching." "He is sharp enough to get to spend." "All this keep to thyself," adds Penn, and Logan accordingly, after the usual manner of treating private and confidential correspond-

* Heaven only knows, however, what "excused" may or may not have meant in those days. Perhaps this wronged Samuel Carpenter sat up nights to persuade Mrs. Penn to reconsider her determination and remain in America. "Excused" may have meant "opposed, persecuted, condemned, opposed with violence," or something of that sort.

ence, had the letter placed in the archives of the American Philosophical Society, where the reporters could have access to it. "There now," said Logan, "that letter is safe."

"Pennsylvania has cost me dearer in my poor child," said Penn, "than all other considerations," which, considering that the poor child learned all his deviltry in London, is rather severe on Pennsylvania. And then, with his singular weakness for doing, or endeavoring to do, the most important things at the longest range, he sent this son away from home and its restraining influences, away from himself, away over into a new world, and among strangers, to reform him. The young man came over with John Evans, the newly appointed Deputy Governor, a youth of twenty-six years, who was recommended by Penn as a "sober and sensible young man," who would be "discreet and advisable, especially by the best of our friends."

But the Governor was most dreadfully taken in on young Evans, and the two young men made Rome howl when they had been long enough in the province to get acquainted a little. By this time, only about one third of the population of Philadelphia were members of the Society of Friends, and these youths had no trouble in finding plenty of convivial society. They tarried long at the wine; they sang "In the morning by the bright light" on the streets, with great vigor but a little out of tune; they bought the police; and, secure by the dignity of their positions, the Deputy Governor and the son of the proprietor made the morals of the city worse than any other two men could have done, because their boon companions found immunity from arrest in the company of the Deputy Governor.

Young Penn was elected a member of the Provincial Council, but as it met in the daytime, he was seldom able to attend; a deputation of "one hundred Indians, nine of whom were kings," called upon him, to pay their respects to the son of Onas and gather in a bale of presents; but even this cataract of royalty failed to mend the young man's ways. In open opposition to the tenets of his sect, he joined the war party and organized a body of those fell destroyers of cakes and ale known as militia in Philadelphia. He sold Williamstadt,* the beautiful manor of eight thousand acres given him by his indulgent father, because Logan could not supply him with money fast enough. He was a prodigal son in every respect save the last chapter.

Finally this riotous conduct culminated in a free fight one night at Enoch Story's tavern. Deputy Governor Evans, Sheriff John Finney, Joseph Ralph, and Thomas Gray the scrivener, —a reporter, maybe,—and young Penn pounded a watchman or two, but the guardians of the peace were re-enforced by "the Mayor, Recorder, and one Alderman;" the lights were put out, and Alderman Wilcox pounded the ground with Deputy Governor Evans, not knowing who he was, and when the unhappy executive disclosed his identity and dignity the indignant Alderman leaped upon him and whipped him again for lying to him. And in the mean time somebody else was wiping up the floor with young William Penn.

The Deputy Governor felt greatly chagrined over this affair, especially about the right eye and the end of his nose; and young Penn, after being presented by the grand jury, shortly after returned to England. His father would have been less than a man had he not felt hurt at what he considered the harshness with which his son had been treated. "Bad Friends' treatment of him," said the father, "stumbled him from the truth. I justify not his folly, and still less their provocation." Logan says the presentment was "an indignity put upon the son of the Founder, which is looked upon by most moderate men as very base." But then, it must be remembered, the people of Pennsylvania never saw enough of the Founder to get very well acquainted with him, and the son of some man away over in London was a person of very little consequence to a great many of the colonists, especially the Dutch and Swedes.

Troubles never come single.* If they had been content to come only in pairs or triplets, Penn would have been a happier man, but they began to rain upon him now. (His daughter Letitia married William Aubrey, who appears to have been a cannibal and desired to live on his father-in-law.) He clamored for the payment of his wife's portion much faster than Penn could pay it, and Logan describes him as "one of the keenest men living." Young William's creditors were also pressing the Governor. "Both son and daughter clamor," said Penn, "she to quiet him that is a scraping man and will count interest for a guinea;" young William had entirely renounced the Society of Friends, ran for Parliament and got left, and wanted to enter the army.

In the province Evans was vainly endeavoring to re-unite the territories and the province, and as vainly trying to get the Assembly to vote a supply for the Government and pay up their quit-rents, the Assembly being convinced that the £2,000 they had voted some years before would, if it were ever collected, run the province for fifty years. As to the quit-rents, they said, they were reserved for the support of the Government,—which was probably intended for a joke. There was very little money in Pennsylvania at that time, and had the Assembly desired to vote a revenue, it could hardly have been collected.

Governor Evans had William Biles imprisoned for calling him a boy, and saying "they would kick him out, because he was not fit to govern them." He was making strong efforts to organize a militia, and, to test the sense of the people, he one day caused a report to be circulated that the French were coming up the river, and then rushing into the street, sword in hand, Evans called upon the people to arm and follow him. Instead of following him, however, the population broke for the woods, by a large majority. This disheartening indication that the martial spirit was either dead or in a rapid decline was very discouraging to the Deputy Governor. However, he succeeded in persuading the territories to build a fort at New Castle, at which the ships reported or which they ran by, as they saw fit. The Assembly drew up articles of impeachment against Logan, Evans's secretary, and finally addressed the proprietary such a letter of remonstrance, in which were set forth all the follies and evils of Evans's administration, that Penn recalled him and he left the province in 1708.

Among other very wise and useful maxims that he wrote for the guidance and instruction of other people, William Penn, after due deliberation and the usual period of incubation, evolved the following nugget of solid wisdom: "A man may be defrauded in many ways by a servant; as in care, pains, money, trust." And about this time he began to understand how that might be himself.

Philip Ford was Penn's confidential man; his steward. That is, he had been. At this time he was dead, and had probably gone where the other rich man went, and was spending all his time prospecting for water, with never an indication, or a show of color. He was, in his life-time, a member of the Society of Friends, an eminently respectable man, though not so good a man as John Evans. Penn liked him, for some inscrutable reason, placed all confidence in him, gave him full charge of all his affairs, never looked into his accounts, and in every way treated him as though he were cashier of a bank and Penn were only president. When Ford wanted any papers signed, he simply told any lie about them that happened to come handy, and William Penn said, "Oh, never mind, Friend Ford, anything thee does is O. K," and blandly signed them.

The result of all this easy book-keeping was just what any ordinary business-man would have known it would be; in a few years the servant had so much more money than the master, that when Penn wanted to come to America the second time he was a little short, and Philip Ford said he could let him have £2,800. As a mere matter of form, however, not that it was really necessary between them as man and man, you understand, but to give the affair a business-like finish, you know, if he would just make a kind of deed of the province to Ford, as a sort of security like?

"Why, certainly," Penn said, and signed the deed.

"It is really a deed," said the steward, "but we will consider it just a mortgage."

"Oh yes," said this singularly easy-going Governor, "we'll play it is a mortgage." And he went on his way, repeating to himself the following selections from his excellent maxims:

"An able bad man is an ill instrument, and to be shunned as the plague.

"Be not deceived with the first appearance of things, but give thyself time to be in the right.

"It is ill mistaking where the matter is of importance.

"It is not enough that a thing be right, if it be not fit to be done. If not prudent, though just, it is not advisable. He that loses by getting had better lose than get."

Ford continued in favor and confidence and full fellowship, receiving and disbursing moneys, charging compound interest every six months at eight per cent in all his advances, and Penn continued to know nothing about it all, until the rascally old steward died and went as hereinbefore-mentioned. Then his son, who was worse than his father, and widow Ford, who was worse than her son, returned from the funeral and came down upon the astonished Governor with this conveyance of the province in one hand and a bill for £14,000, or £12,000, or £10,500, as the case may be, depending upon which authority you accept. Penn didn't have that amount right in his clothes, and asked for an itemized bill, by which it appeared that his steward, by his own accounts, had received on behalf of Penn £17,859, and paid out £1,659, but still, so deftly were those papers manipulated, they brought Penn more than £10,500 in his steward's debt. It was the interest that ran it up so. The Fords had charged interest both on their advances and on Penn's payments, then they added both interest accounts together, compounded it, and deducting the amount from the payment, added it to their original advance, and then computed interest on it from that date. So that every time Penn made a payment of £300 it cost him £450 to make it good, and it would have been money in his pocket to have stayed out altogether and made no payments. It requires a man of broad comprehension, profound judgment, liberal education, and a quick intuition to comprehend the mysteries of scientific book-keeping.

Penn, by the assistance of two experts, managed to cut the claim down to £4,303, which he offered to pay, but the Fords demanded their pound of flesh, and the case went into court. The special case of debt, the original £2,000, was affirmed, the sum amounting with costs to about £3,000, and on the 10th of February Governor William Penn was arrested by a member of his own Society of Friends, at Grace Street Church. Acting on legal advice, Penn went into Fleet Street Prison, and so he got around to where he started. Thirty-seven years before, a file of soldiers arrested him while he was preaching at this very church, and dragged him away to prison. And now it was a Quaker who, disregarding his standing in the Society of which they were both members, with no respect for his high station in the world, with no reverence for his gray hairs, with no more claim of right or justice than the soldiers of Charles were armed with, arrested the old man at a Quaker meeting-house, and forced him to prison. This world is made up mainly of men and women, and people are very much like people after all.

Penn lay in prison about nine months, when the Fords began to talk of a compromise. The proprietary then mortgaged the province once more, having derived so much profit and pleasure from the first mortgage, and raised £6,800. The Fords were paid £7,500, and Penn left the prison and went to his home in Brentford, having had abundant leisure, during his prison life, to amass material for one more maxim, "You can't most always tell anything about nobody."

CHAPTER XIX.

AT REST.

COLONEL GOOKIN, the new Deputy Governor, arrived in Pennsylvania about five o'clock on the evening of March 17th, and was knee-deep in the usual wrangle with the Assembly at seven o'clock on the morning of the 18th. The quarrel should and would have begun the evening before he got there, had the two parties known where to find each other. The Assembly reflected upon the Council, made direct charges against Logan, the Secretary, abused Evans roundly, refused to furnish the Queen the hundred and fifty soldiers she demanded, and only offered to vote money under conditions that were resented by the Governor as mean and discourteous, and generally trod on everybody's corns that were within reach of the legislative heel.

The next Assembly, chosen in October of this same year, was a little worse than its predecessor; the same old party was successful, and David Lloyd was again elected Speaker. Logan came to England, received a triumphant acquittal at the hands of both Friends and civil authorities,—somewhat remote from the location of the charges, it is true, but he was acquitted, none the less,—and while there he told Penn all this pleasant news about the model state.

Sixty-five years and much trouble were beginning to tell on the rugged frame of the Founder, but he could not give up the "Holy Experiment" without one more effort to restore to its councils the harmony and fraternal confidence with which it had been planted. He wrote his factious colonists a patriarchal epistle from London, in which he ran over his old dreams and plans and present hopes for Pennsylvania; mourned that it had been to him but a source of "grief, trouble, and poverty;" declared his readiness to grant them anything that "would make you happier in the relations between us;" reminded them that already they had made three constitutions with no opposition from him; protested against the Assembly's assuming to meet and adjourn when it will as prejudicial to good order; and told them "nothing could be more destructive than to take so much of the provision and executive part of the Government out of the Governor's hands and lodge it in an uncertain collective body," and that he did not think it "prudent in the people to crave these powers." Alas, poor Penn! Before many years the people in the American colonies were craving a great many powers that their non-resident Governors did not think it "prudent" for them to have. The Founder complained that he "had but too sorrowful a view and sight to complain of the manner in which he had been treated;" that "my quit-rents, never sold by me," had been turned to the support of the Government, his overplus land claimed; his secretary persecuted on account of the Governor; that Penn himself and his "suffering family" had "been reduced to hardships;" he asked them to "consider the regard due to him that had not been paid," and with much gentle and touching expostulation, and earnest prayers for the blessings of "peace, love, and industry" upon "our poor country," he subscribes himself "your real friend as well as just proprietor and Governor."

This expostulatory epistle touched the right spot. The State Central Committee made a campaign document of it and franked it all over the state; the Friends turned out on election-day and stayed all day at the polls and worked like beavers, with the exception of the gaudy and frivolous worldly mill-privileges enjoyed and employed by beavers, and in the election for the Assembly of 1710 the Founder was vindicated, Pennsylvania was saved, the gray light of victory shone on the upturned faces of the vanguard, reform was triumphant, calumny and aspersion fled away in the black night of a nation's rebuke, and the traitorous hand that lifted its envenomed tongue to stab the heart of the state hid its grovelling head in the dust of defeat, while the black night of arnica that threatened to overwhelm our glorious ship of state was trampled under the indignant feet of the godlike voice of the people. David Lloyd was kicked higher than Gilderoy's celebrated kite, not one of the old Assembly was reelected, the Committee of One Hundred did not go home till morning, and Isaac Norris got off a joke.*

* It was about "astral influences," a very mild-mannered

Good-will and general concord now reigned in the councils of Pennsylvania. The new Assembly, when the Queen made a requisition on the province for war supplies, passed a bill appropriating "£2,000 for the Queen's use." "We did not see it inconsistent with our principles," gravely explains one of the members, "to give the Queen money, the use to which she put it being her affair, not ours." But they wouldn't vote a dollar of war supplies. And thus his satanic majesty was larrupped around the shrubbery even as a calico horse around the circus-ring. As the province voted no war supplies, the Queen bought a ship-load of powder and muskets and paid off two regiments of soldiers * with the money, nobody's conscience was disturbed, and everybody was happy.

As if to crown this year of good things with fatness, word reached Penn that a silver-mine had been discovered in his province, near Conestoga. The news was brought to the joke, which is carefully labelled and explained as "a piece of pleasantry" by his biographer.

* The pay of the British soldier was sixteen cents a year and find himself.

Council by an Indian. Neither the Council nor Penn had yet learned how difficult it is for any but an expert to distinguish a full-grown Indian from an able-bodied liar, and these innocent men believed him. The Governor had an eye like a hawk for anything that looked like money, and the next mail carried letters of instruction to his secretary to look into this silver-mine, hire an expert to go out to it, and see whether it assayed half so much ore as it did ten times as much assessments.

There was no silver-mine. The Indian liar, asking the Council to excuse him while he went out and laughed, went back into the trackless forest with one eye closed and his aboriginal tongue thrust far into the recesses of his dusky cheek, while ever and anon he smote with open palm his sinewy thigh and carolled his wild laughter to the rustling oaks. Thus upon the invading race of pale-faced men he had played his unusual joke with his accustomed Indian-nuity.* It may have been that with prophetic eye the savage looked up Chestnut Street and saw the Keystone National Bank and the United States Mint, but those inexhaustible mines, though located in his own province, William Penn had never a chance to work. His paper wasn't sufficiently gilt-edged for the one, and his bullion was too prior for the other.

His final chapter of literary work was written this year, a preface to John Banks's Journal, and it indicates no mental weakness, no approach of the decay of that intellectual vigor that had marked all his writings, no shadow of the cloud that was soon to darken the clear mind. On the whole, the evening was gathering about him pleasantly. There was peace in his beloved province, and if the silver-mine did not pan out, there was an ocean of petroleum, and had the colonists only had Colonel Drake for a Governor, the Standard Oil Company would have owned all western Pennsylvania before the Revolution.

The Assembly of 1711 passed a law prohibiting the importation of any more slaves, and although, in reply to William Southbe's petition for a law declaring the freedom of all negroes, the Assembly in 1712 resolved "it is neither just nor convenient to set them at liberty," still the leaven of abolitionism was working. It is interesting to note that the act of 1711 was promptly cancelled by the Crown as soon as it reached England, for the mother-country was in the slave-trade then with great profit and eagerness. Parliament was doing all it could to promote the inhuman traffic; in some instances —notably in Pennsylvania—it was fairly forced upon the colonies, and not until the days of '76 did freedom come to the negro even in the Northern States.

For several years Penn had been negotiating with the home government for the sale of his province to the Crown. His province was decorated with that clinging symbol of fidelity and attachment known as a plain open-and-shut mortgage; the annual yield of quit-rents continued to be represented by a round and symmetrical O, the cares and worry of provincial affairs were weighing heavily upon him, and for his peace of mind and health of pocket it was perhaps better that he should sell. He was an old man; he had well-nigh reached the limit that bounds the ordinary life-time of men; affliction and cares of many kinds, anxiety for his province and anxious sorrow for his wayward boy, persecutions and prisons and sixty-eight years were accomplishing their perfect work on his mind and body. Regretfully he put his hand to the preliminary papers relating to the sale of his model state, which he finally agreed should pass to the Crown for "£12,000, payable in four years, with certain stipulations." But before the deed was executed, paralysis checked the hand and clouded the brain of the Founder, and the transfer was never made; William Penn died proprietor and Governor of Pennsylvania.

From the second shock of paralysis which came upon him in Bristol, "while he was writing a letter to Logan, so suddenly," Janney says, "that his hand was arrested in the beginning of a sentence which he never completed," he never entirely recovered. In this last letter by his hand, the Founder treats upon his never-failing theme of poverty, "for it's my excessive expenses upon Pennsylvania that has sunk me so low, and nothing else; my expenses yearly in England ever exceeding my income;" . . . . both my daughter and son Aubrey are under the greatest uneasiness about their money which I desire, as well as allow thee to return per first. 'Tis an epidemic disease on your side the sea to be too oblivious of returns. . . . I have paid William Aubrey* (with a mad, bullying treatment from him into the bargain) but £500, which with several hundreds paid at several times to him here makes near £1,100, besides what thou hast sold and put out to interest there,—which is so deep a cut to me here;—and nothing but my son's tempestuous and most rude treatment of my wife and self too should have forced it to me. Therefore do not lessen thy care to pay me, or at least to secure the money on her manor of Mount Joy, for a plantation for me or one of my children." The closing sentence of the unfinished letter runs: "I am glad to see Sybylla Masters, who has just come down to the city and is with us, but sorry at M. Phillips's coming, without just a hint of it. She"—

The pen that dropped from his hand was never resumed. After he recovered somewhat, "by easy journeys he reached London," writes his wife, "and endeavored to settle some affairs and get some laws passed for that country's ease and his own and family's comfort." He was unable, however, "to bear the fatigues of the town," and went to his home in Ruscombe, where he had resided for the past two years. Scarcely had he reached home, however, early in February, when a third time he was stricken with paralysis, "and though," writes Hannah Penn, "through the Lord's mercy he is much better than he was, and in a pretty hopeful way of recovery, yet I am forbid by his doctors to trouble him with any business until better."

She never troubled him with business again, but took his case into her own hands with true wifely devotion. Six years Penn lived after his third attack, and the closing scenes of his life were "sweet, comfortable, and easy;" his wife kept "the thoughts of business from him;" his bodily health continued good; he took great pleasure in the presence of the children of his wayward son William, whose neglected wife and family were at Ruscombe; but his memory failed, his mind was darkened, and so, delighting himself in the great house at Ruscombe, "walking and taking the air when the weather allowed, and at other times diverting himself from room to room," he walked in childish pleasures and his own native innocence down the easy decline of his pilgrimage, until he reached the resting-place at the foot of the hill on the 30th of July, 1718, in the seventy-fifth year of a life that had crowned its little faults with great virtues.

They buried him in the Friends graveyard at Jordans, in Buckinghamshire, by the side of his well-beloved Gulielma. Only two miles away from Jordans, on one side, is Beaconsfield; about as far in the other direction is Chalfont St. Giles, where first he met Guli Springett, nearly half a century before. Only six miles away is Rickmansworth, where he took Guli to spend her honeymoon. Only eight miles away is the old village of Penn, which is said to have taken its name from Penn's ancestors and where the only Penn born in America, John, is buried. It is a quiet resting-place. The plain tiled meeting-house with its old-fashioned lattice windows; the three-roomed cottage, where the women still hold their business meetings; the roomy stabling covered by the extended roof of the meeting-house; and, close by, the little oblong burial-ground, are all shut in by leafy limes and beeches, and beyond the woods the pleasant meadows stretch away in lonely restfulness; only a single house can be seen in any direction from Jordans. Here lies Thomas Ellwood, Guli Springett's first lover, who loved her so dearly he dared not speak of it, fearing the blow of a rejection; but he was ever a warm and faithful friend to her and her husband. Here Penn's wives are buried; here sleep their children, Springett, the first-born, and Letitia; here rest the Penningtons, Guli's step-father and mother; here is buried Ellwood's wife; and somewhere in this little burial-ground William Penn is sleeping.

Just exactly where, nobody knows. Only a short time since, the people of Pennsylvania thought an agreeable and eminently proper feature in the bicentenary celebration of the founding of the model state, which will occur in October, 1882, would be the removal of the remains of the Founder from England to the state he founded. The report of this intention reached Jordans about June, just the time of holding the regular Yearly Meeting, and a feeling was produced which was something akin to excitement. The Friends in the Chalfont valleys suddenly remembered how dear William Penn was to them, and this feeling spread like a contagion through all England. Everybody in England loved William Penn, and dearly and tenderly did they revere his memory, and lovingly would they guard, even as the apples of their eyes, his sacred bones. True, their fathers had oftentimes plunged those sacred bones into filthy prisons, when the bones regarded love and hate a great deal more sensitively than they do now; true, their most brilliant historian had been the only man in all the world of letters found willing and anxious to blacken the name and smirch the fair fame of William Penn, but no matter. Dear were his bones and sacred his memory, and now no prowling hand from Yankee-land should violate his sacred grave with its polluting touch. And then when they thought of the boundless rapacity of the Ohio medical student, and the hyenaic enterprise of the man who robbed the grave of Stewart,—not any English king of that name, but an American Stewart whose grave was worth robbing,—they trembled, and besought the Government to set a trusty man-at-arms to keep a faithful watch and ward above the grave of Penn.

Just about that point the interest in the discussion culminated. The Government was perfectly willing that the man-at-arms should watch the grave of Penn, but—which grave should he watch?

That, gentle reader, was the gaul of it. Nobody knows positively where William Penn is buried. He is buried somewhere in the graveyard of Jordans, but that is all we know. Many years ago the "Testimony of Reading Friends" bore witness that "the field in which the illustrious dead repose is not even decently smoothed. There are no gravel-walks, no monuments, no mournful yews, no cheerful flowers; there is not even a stone to mark a spot or record a name." For one hundred and forty-four years these graves lay unmarked, and the first attempt to identify and mark any of them was made in June, 1862. And when, even after this attempt at identification had been made, and people who had visited the grave of William Penn were mortified to learn they had wept and plucked blades of grass from the resting-place of Isaac Pennington or Mrs. Ellwood, it was learned that the attempted identification that disturbed their reminiscences and ruined their relics was untrustworthy. The trustees of the Jordans burial-ground, scarcely longer ago than a year, declined to pledge themselves to a precise identification of Penn's grave. For a century and a half the grave was unmarked. In all that time a rough and by no means certain plan of the graveyard was the only clue to the location of any of the graves, and it is more than doubted whether identification is at all possible. So, even if Pennsylvania should get the handful of nameless dust that reposes under the stone marked—for the past twenty years—with Penn's name, it would only be a doubtful quantity.

And why should Pennsylvania want his bones, that never had his body? While his ideas were American, Penn was by birth and residence an Englishman. In the thirty-six years that he was proprietor and Governor of Pennsylvania, from 1682 to 1718, he spent but four years in America, and these in visits of two years each, separated by an interval of about sixteen years. And much of the want of harmony between the Founder and the colonists, often unjustly charged to the grasping spirit of the latter, was owing to his own continued absence. He was a stranger to his province, as the colonists were strangers to him. They couldn't go to England to get acquainted with the Founder, and he wouldn't, or at any rate didn't, come to America often enough or stay long enough to get acqainted with them. As he didn't live here, and of his own will chose Jordans for his last resting-place, there seems no reason why his remains—"supposing," in the language of the trustees of the Jordans burial-ground, "that they did exist"—should be disturbed.

If the ancient Pennsylvanians were accused by the Founder and his friends of avarice and ingratitude, of grasping overmuch, and of "thinking it no sin," as Logan said, "to haul what they can from you," it must be remembered that the proprietary and the colonists looked at these things from very different points of view; that the growing spirit of freedom and popular government, on even a broader basis of popular rights than Penn had conceived, was developing beyond his conception in a colony with which his actual personal connection was so slight. They would not pay his quit-rents, but it was on principle, not from niggardly meanness. And while they held back on the one hand, certainly no man ever accused Penn of any undue bashfulness about asking for money. His letters to Pennsylvania were one continuous song of poverty, his great financial losses by his provincial speculation, and urgent requests for supplies and quit-rents. Like the theme in an intricate musical transcription, whatever other topic his letters touched upon, the song of the quit-rents moaned along through them all like a bassoon solo with orchestral accompaniment. And at his death, for a man who had spent forty years complaining of poverty, he was able to leave his family in comparatively comfortable circumstances. His estates in England and Ireland, bringing an income of £1,500 a year, were left to his grandchildren—Guli, Springett, and William Penn—the children of his prodigal son.* In addition he left to these children and to his daughter Letitia, being issue of his first wife, each ten thousand acres of land in Pennsylvania. All the residue of his Pennsylvania lands he left to the children of his second wife, Hannah Penn, to be conveyed to them at her discretion, after enough had been sold to pay his debts. All his personal property he left to his wife Hannah. The will was in chancery several years, as usual; for no man, even though he be a Governor and a wise man, can make a will that does not read three or four different ways; but all was eventually left as the testator wished. John, Thomas, and Richard—Penn's sons by his second marriage—became proprietors of the province, and presently the Penn family began to reap a golden harvest from the Pennsylvania plantation.

* This son William never reformed. He abandoned his family, went to the Continent, and continued in the prodigal business with eminent success until 1720, when he died of consumption, brought on by his excesses. He was very penitent at the last. His father never knew the saddest chapters of his boy's history.

After the war of Independence, the Penns not taking a remarkably active part on the side of the colonies, the Pennsylvania Legislature passed a bill which vested in the commonwealth the estate of the Penn family, but reserved to William Penn's descendants all their private estates, "including quit-rents and arrearages of rents,"—for down to the end of recorded time nothing will probably ever be done about the Penn estates in Pennsylvania into which the ghost of the quit-rent will not come stalking like a financial Banquo. This same act appropriated £130,000 sterling to be paid to the representatives of Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, which was all paid within a few years after the bill was passed. When we bear in mind what was usually done with the estates of foreign non-residents by victorious kings at the close of a war in those days, one cannot complain that the Pennsylvanians did not remember gratefully and loyally the Founder of their state, and for his sake deal generously, justly, and, by the laws of war and the code of the time, more than justly, by his sons. And when it is remembered that the British Government allowed the heirs of Penn £500,000 for their losses by the American Revolution, and that the original cost of the state of Pennsylvania was £16,000, and paid for by a hopeless debt at that, we are led to hope that the heirs of William Penn have outlived the alarming destitution and pinching poverty that was a burden on the life of their great ancestor. Pennsylvania has not been ungrateful to the Founder. While England persecuted him, Pennsylvania was an asylum for himself and his friends. While English laws cast him into prison, the laws of Pennsylvania were such as he made them. While an English historian sought to blacken his character, Pennsylvania was ever his stanch defender. With a generosity not demanded or expected by the laws of nations, Pennsylvania, in the day of its own poverty and hard-won independence, enriched the loyalist descendants of his name, while its own noble son, Morris, his purse drained by sacrifices for his state and country, died in poverty. And jarring differences of state policy only arose between Penn and the model state when the Founder, by his long years of absence, made himself a stranger to the changing opinions and growing ideas of the state he planted.

CHAPTER XX.

"THE NOBLEST WORK OF GOD."

THE honest man who was born two hundred and thirty-eight years ago was no better than the honest man born in our own fairer times, but he was a much greater rarity. To-day, good men are so common they are often overlooked; in those older days, a good man was eagerly sought for, and when the authorities found him they put him in prison lest he should get away entirely, and the kingdom be left without even a small sample of goodness. If he was extraordinarily good, they cut off his head. A good man was at a premium, but he rarely cared to collect the premium himself, because he had a family to support. A man who would attract not more than ordinary attention to-day shone out then like a comet among stars. In that elder day it was a rare advantage with serious drawbacks for a good man with a live conscience to live.

He enjoyed a monopoly of the business, until it occurred to some bishop to make a sacred bonfire of him.

It was in such an era of the world's history that William Penn came upon the stage of human affairs, and was hailed as a star before the curtain went down on the first act. In such an age, a man of character so decidedly marked, of convictions so conscientiously felt and so earnestly pronounced, could not remain concealed, could not walk in obscure paths.

He had the faults of men, the weaknesses of humanity, because he was not a god. His faculty of self-interest was well developed, and down to old age he retained unimpaired his excellent voice for quit-rents. His keen acquisitiveness, his constant clamor for his quit-rents, and repeated and again repeated assertions of his grievous poverty, detract from the dignity of a character in all other respects noble and lovable, and are apt to impress one with pity rather than sympathy. But it is from his many virtues, and not from his few weaknesses, that we read the elevating lessons of his life.

Born in stormy times, he walked amid troubled waters all his days. In an age of bitter persecution and unbridled wickedness, he never wronged his conscience. A favored member of a court where statesmanship was intrigue and trickery, where the highest morality was corruption, and whose austerity was venality, he never stained his hands with a bribe. Living under a government at war with the people, and educated in a school that taught the doctrine of passive obedience, his life-long dream was of popular government, of a state where the people ruled. In his early manhood, at the bidding of conscience, against the advice of his nearest friends, in opposition to stern paternal commands, against every dictate of worldly wisdom and human prudence, in spite of all the dazzling temptations of ambition so alluring to the heart of a young man, he turned away from the broad, fair highway to wealth, position, and distinction that the hands of a king opened before him, and casting his lot with the sect weakest and most unpopular in England, through paths that were tangled with trouble and lined with pitiless thorns of persecution, he walked into honor and fame, and the reverence of the world, such as royalty could not promise and could not give him.

In the land where he planted his model state, to-day no descendant bears his name. In the religious society for which he suffered banishment from home, persecution, and the prison, to-day no child of his blood and name walks in Christian fellowship nor stands uncovered in worship. His name has faded out of the living meetings of the Friends, out of the land that crowns his memory with sincerest reverence. Even the uncertain stone that would mark his grave stands doubtingly among the kindred ashes that hallow the ground where he sleeps.

But his monument, grander than storied column of granite or noble shapes of bronze, is set in the glittering brilliants of mighty states between the seas. His noblest epitaph is written in the state that bears his honored name. The little town he planned to be his capital has become a city larger in area than any European capital he knew. Beyond his fondest dreams has grown the state he planted in the wilderness by "deeds of peace." Out of the gloomy mines that slept in rayless mystery beneath its mountains while he lived, the measureless wealth of his model state sparkles and glows on millions of hearth-stones. From its forests of derricks and miles of creeping pipe-lines, the world is lighted from the state of Penn, with a radiance to which the sons of the Founder's sons were blind. Roaring blast and smoky forge and ringing hammer are tearing and beating the wealth of princes from his mines that the Founder never knew. Clasping the continent, from sea to sea, stretches a chain of states free as his own; from sunrise to sunset reaches a land where the will of the people is the supreme law, a land that never felt the pressure of a throne and never saw a sceptre. And in the heart of the city that was his capital, in old historic halls still stands the bell that first, in the name of the doctrines that he taught his colonists, proclaimed liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof. This is his monument, and every noble charity gracing the state he founded is his epitaph.
